Armed Conflicts in the World Since the End of the Cold War (1989 - Present)

Summary

This report contains a compiled list of wars and armed conflicts in the world – both civil and inter-state – that began after 1989 or were in progress at that date. Because of definitional problems related to classifying wars, this information should be used with some caution. This report includes lists arranged both chronologically and alphabetically.

Armed Conflicts in the World Since the End of the Cold War (1989 - Present)

Background

The fall of the Berlin Wall in 1989 was the most dramatic signal that the Cold War between the world's two superpowers was coming to an end. During the Cold War, most wars were considered an extension of the conflict between the United States and the Soviet Union. However, the end of the Cold War did not bring the end of armed conflict. Despite the termination of the Cold War, nations continue to fight wars, both internally and with their neighbors. The following tables are a listing, compiled from several sources (see attached source list), of post-1989 civil and inter-state wars, including those conflicts that began prior to that date.

Sources differ as to what constitutes a war. For the purposes of this compilation, a civil war is a conflict contained within the borders of one country where national government military forces were actively involved in fighting, the opposing side offered effective resistance, and there were at least 1,000 combatant casualties. An inter-state war is a military conflict between two entities that are commonly recognized as sovereign states where at least 1,000 battle deaths occurred.

Various discrepancies exist among the sources used in this compilation regarding data on casualties, onset and termination dates, and the nature of some conflicts:

- A common definition of war includes conflicts with at least 1,000 casualties. However, reliable casualty figures – especially for smaller conflicts – often do not exist. It is not unusual for different sources to report conflicting casualty figures.
- Fixing dates as to when a war began or ended is also problematic.
- Flare-ups or resumptions of fighting pose one problem. For example, a renewal of fighting after a break in hostilities is sometimes classified as a continuation of a previous war and at other times as a new war.
- In some conflicts, the participants disagree about when the conflict is resolved. One may claim victory while the other vows to carry on the struggle.
- In some cases, delineating between wars where one party is fighting several others is a point of disagreement among sources. Some sources consider such a case to be multiple wars, but other sources consider it to be one extended war.

- Since most wars include aspects of both civil and interstate conflict, definitional problems also extend to classifying wars as either civil or inter-state. Because of these difficulties, credible sources often differ in what they include in their listings of current wars.

In compiling this list, the authors loosely followed the definition of civil and inter-state wars offered by the University of Michigan's Correlates of War Project. However, when questions arose about a conflict's exact identifying characteristics, the most expansive estimates were used.
