

CRS Report for Congress

Received through the CRS Web

Latin America and the Caribbean: Issues for the 108th Congress

Updated November 5, 2004

Mark P. Sullivan, Coordinator
Foreign Affairs, Defense, and Trade Division

J. F. Hornbeck, Clare Ribando, K. Larry Storrs,
Maureen Taft-Morales, and Connie Veillette
Foreign Affairs, Defense, and Trade Division

Latin America and the Caribbean: Issues for the 108th Congress

Summary

This report, which will be updated periodically, examines issues in U.S. policy toward Latin America and the Caribbean, focusing especially on the role of Congress and congressional concerns. For more details and discussion, see the listed CRS products after each section.

The Latin American and Caribbean region has made enormous strides over the past two decades in political development, with all countries but Cuba having regular free and fair elections for head of state. But several nations face considerable challenges that have threatened political stability, including economic decline and rising poverty, violent guerrilla conflicts, drug trafficking, and increasing crime.

Bush Administration officials maintain that U.S. policy toward Latin America has three overarching goals: strengthening security; promoting democracy and good governance; and stimulating economic development. Some observers argue that the Administration has not been paying enough attention to the region and to instability in several countries. They maintain that the United States, faced with other pressing foreign policy problems like the war in Iraq and the global anti-terrorist campaign, has fallen back to a policy of benign neglect of the region. In contrast, others maintain that the United States has an active policy toward Latin America and point to the considerable assistance and support provided to Colombia and its neighbors as they combat drug trafficking and terrorist groups. They also point to the momentum toward free trade in the region through negotiation of numerous free trade agreements, and to increased bilateral and regional cooperation on security issues.

Congressional attention to Latin America in the 108th Congress has continued to focus on counter-narcotics and counter-terrorism efforts in the Andean region, trade issues, and potential threats to democracy and stability. U.S. counter-narcotics efforts focus on continuation of the Andean Counterdrug Initiative supporting Colombia and its neighbors in their struggle against drug trafficking and drug-financed terrorist groups. With regard to trade, Congress approved implementing legislation for a bilateral free trade agreement with Chile in July 2003; the United States signed a combined U.S.-Dominican Republic-Central America Free Trade Agreement (DR-CAFTA) on August 5, 2004, but it seems unlikely that consideration of implementing legislation will occur before the end of the 108th Congress. Congress has also paid increased attention to economic, social, and political tensions in South America that could threaten democratic order, particularly in the Andean region. In the Caribbean, Haiti's persistent poverty and political instability has remained a congressional concern, as has assistance to Haiti and other Caribbean nations in the aftermath of devastating damage incurred by hurricanes and storms in 2004. Congress has also continued to debate the appropriate U.S. policy approach to Cuba, the region's only holdout to democracy, as it has for the past several years. Finally, Congress has maintained an active interest in neighboring Mexico, with a myriad of trade, migration, border and drug trafficking issues dominating U.S.-Mexico bilateral relations.

Contents

Introduction .....	1
Conditions in the Region .....	1
U.S. Policy .....	2
Regional Issues .....	6
Colombia and the Andean Counterdrug Initiative .....	6
ACI and Related Funding Programs .....	8
The Killing and Capture of U.S. Citizens .....	8
Air Bridge Denial Program .....	9
U.S.-Latin American Trade Relations .....	10
U.S.-Chile FTA .....	10
U.S.-Dominican Republic-Central America FTA (DR-CAFTA) ....	11
Panama and Andean Free Trade Agreements .....	12
Free Trade Area of the Americas .....	12
Terrorism .....	14
AIDS in the Caribbean and Central America .....	16
Country Issues .....	17
Argentina .....	17
Bolivia .....	19
Brazil .....	19
Cuba .....	22
Dominican Republic .....	23
Ecuador .....	24
El Salvador .....	25
Guatemala .....	25
Haiti .....	28
Honduras .....	31
Mexico .....	31
Panama .....	33
Peru .....	35
Venezuela .....	37

Latin America and the Caribbean: Issues for the 108th Congress

Introduction

Conditions in the Region

Latin America has made enormous strides over the past two decades in political development, with all countries but Cuba having regular free and fair elections for head of state. In 2004, free and fair elections for head of government were held in Antigua and Barbuda on March 23; El Salvador on March 21; Panama on May 2; the Dominican Republic on May 16; Venezuela on August 15, for a special presidential recall referendum; St. Kitts and Nevis on October 25; and Uruguay on October 31. Despite this democratic progress, several nations face considerable challenges that threaten political stability, including economic decline and rising poverty, violent guerrilla conflicts, autocratic leaders, drug trafficking, and increasing crime.

The region as a whole experienced slower economic growth over the past several years, with 2002 registering a gross domestic product (GDP) decline of 0.6% and a per capita income decline of almost 2%, the worst economic performance in almost two decades. Argentina, Uruguay, and Venezuela suffered the deepest recessions, skewing the regional data downward, while most other countries had slow, but positive, growth rates. For 2003, regional economic growth was estimated to be 1.5%, with a per capita income increase of 0.2%. Despite improvement in Argentina's economy, a steep economic decline in Venezuela kept the region's average low. The forecast for 2004 is a growth rate of 3.6%.<sup>1</sup>

In South America, especially, the economic downturn increased political pressure on elected governments and led some in the region to question democracy and the democratic free-market model of development. The Andean governments of Bolivia and Peru have faced violent protests, which in Bolivia, led to the resignation of President Gonzalo Sanchez de Lozada on October 17, 2003, just 15 months after he was elected. Colombia is facing challenges from drug trafficking organizations, as well as from two left-wing guerrilla groups and a rightist paramilitary group, all of which, combined, are responsible for thousands of deaths each year. Venezuela has been plagued by political polarization between supporters and opponents of President Hugo Chavez, although Chavez's victory in the August 2004 recall referendum has the potential of reducing polarization. Argentina's democratic political system was under considerable stress after social protests over economic conditions led to the resignation of a democratically elected President in

---

<sup>1</sup> "Latin America Economy: EIU's April Assumptions," Economist Intelligence Unit ViewsWire, April 27, 2004.

December 2001. The political and financial situation has now stabilized, and bold policy moves in the areas of human rights and institutional reform by President Néstor Kirchner, inaugurated in May 2003, has helped restore Argentines' faith in government.

In Central America, countries such as El Salvador, Honduras, and Nicaragua emerged from the turbulent 1980s and 1990s with democratic institutions more firmly entrenched, yet violent crime is rampant. While the 1996 peace accords in Guatemala brought an end to the 36-year civil conflict, the government has not fully implemented substantive reforms associated with the peace plan and the human rights situation remains poor. A new Guatemalan President, Oscar Berger, was elected in December 2003 and was inaugurated on January 14, 2004. Observers are hoping that he will improve upon the performance of his predecessor.

In the Caribbean, Haitian President Jean-Bertrand Aristide resigned on February 29, 2004, under disputed circumstances after armed opposition groups had taken control of half the country. President Bush deployed U.S. military forces to Haiti to secure key facilities and to help secure the arrival of a Multinational Interim Force, authorized by the U.N. Security Council, which was succeeded by the United Nations Stabilization Mission in Haiti (MINUSTAH) in June 2004. In Cuba, Fidel Castro retains tight control over the Communist government. The human rights situation deteriorated significantly in 2003, with the arrest and imprisonment of 75 dissidents.

U.S. Policy

Congressional attention to Latin America in the 108th Congress has focused on counter-narcotics and counter-terrorism efforts in the Andean region, security cooperation with Latin America, and trade issues, such as free trade agreements with Chile and Central American countries and the regional Free Trade Area of the Americas (FTAA). Congressional consideration of the annual foreign operations appropriations legislation that funds foreign aid remains an important way for Congress to influence U.S. policy toward the region. Congress has maintained an active interest in neighboring Mexico, with a myriad of trade, migration, border and drug trafficking issues dominating U.S.-Mexico bilateral relations.

U.S. counter-narcotics efforts in the region have continued to focus on the Administration's Andean Counterdrug Initiative<sup>2</sup> that supports Colombia and its neighbors with foreign assistance in their struggle against drug trafficking and drug-financed terrorist groups. Congress has been increasingly concerned about the problem of illegal narcotics in the Andean region and has been divided over an <sup>2</sup> The U.S. program to provide anti-narcotics assistance to Colombia, in support of Plan Colombia, and its neighbors is called the Andean Counterdrug Initiative. In 2001, the Bush Administration requested funding for FY2002, and then later for FY2003, for the "Andean Regional Initiative," which encompassed State Department counterdrug funding (the Andean Counterdrug Initiative) as well as other assistance programs, such as development assistance, child survival and health, economic support funds, and Foreign Military Financing. For FY2004, the budget request returned to the usage of Andean Counterdrug Initiative, and requested funds for the other assistance programs from their regular accounts.

---

appropriate policy. Congress has expressed repeated concerns over the capture and killing of various U.S. citizens by the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC) and the National Liberation Army (ELN).

Security issues became a higher-profile aspect of U.S. relations with Latin America in the aftermath of the September 11, 2001, terrorists attacks in the United States. Bilateral and regional cooperation on anti-terrorism issues increased, and the United States expanded its assistance to Colombia beyond a strictly counternarcotics focus to also include counterterrorism support. In June 2002, the United States and other members of the Organization of American States (OAS) signed an Inter-American Convention Against Terrorism that would improve regional cooperation. President Bush submitted the convention to the Senate for its advice and consent in November 2002, and the Senate Foreign Relations Committee held a June 17, 2004, hearing on the convention.

U.S. officials maintain that the most effective and rapid means to stimulate economic development in Latin America is through trade, and they have set the goal of strengthening trade linkages with the region through the negotiation of numerous free trade agreements (FTAs):

- On June 6, 2003, the United States and Chile signed a bilateral FTA that had been completed in December 2002. This paved the way for congressional consideration of implementing legislation for the Chile FTA, under so-called fast track procedures, with both the House and Senate approving the measure in July (P.L. 108-77, H.R. 2738).
- In December 2003, the Administration completed negotiations for a U.S.-Central America Free Trade Agreement (CAFTA) with four Central American countries: El Salvador, Honduras, Guatemala, and Nicaragua; Costa Rica agreed to CAFTA in late January 2004 after additional bilateral negotiations with the United States. The United States signed the CAFTA with the five Central American countries on May 28, 2004. Separately, the United States and the Dominican Republic concluded negotiations on a similar FTA on March 15, 2004. On August 5, 2004, all seven countries signed the U.S.-Dominican Republic-Central America Free Trade Agreement (DR-CAFTA). The combined agreement is to be presented as a single legislative package, but because of its controversial nature, it seems unlikely that it will be considered before the end of the 108th Congress.
- The Administration also began FTA negotiations with Panama in late April 2004, and in mid-May 2004 launched FTA negotiations with Colombia, Ecuador, and Peru with the hope that Bolivia will join the U.S.-Andean negotiations in the future.
- Finally, the Administration also is continuing to negotiate with other hemispheric nations for the establishment of a Free Trade Area of the Americas (FTAA) by January 2005, a goal first agreed to at the 1994 Summit of the Americas. Because of differences in the negotiations about how to proceed, it seems increasingly unlikely that a comprehensive agreement can be achieved by January 2005.

In addition to trade policy, the United States supports development in the region through foreign assistance programs largely administered by the U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID). The agency supports such activities as education, poverty reduction, health care, conservation, natural disaster mitigation and reconstruction, counter-narcotics and alternative development, and HIV/AIDS prevention and education. In addition, the United States provides food assistance, anti-terrorism assistance, and security assistance. The Peace Corps is active in many Latin American and Caribbean nations. Overall U.S. foreign aid to the Latin America region amounted to about $862 million in FY2001, $1.5 billion in FY2002, $1.7 billion in FY2003; and an estimated $1.6 billion in FY2004. For FY2005, the Administration has requested about $1.6 billion. (For further information, see CRS Report RL32487, U.S. Foreign Assistance to Latin America and the Caribbean, coordinated by Connie Veillette.)

In the aftermath of several devastating storms in 2004 — Hurricanes Charley, Frances and Ivan, and Tropical Storm Jeanne — the United States is providing humanitarian assistance to the afflicted countries, including Haiti, Grenada, Jamaica, the Bahamas, the Dominican Republic, and Cuba. As of October 27, 2004, the United States has committed or obligated $22.6 million in such assistance. On October 5, 2004, the House approved H.Con.Res. 496 (Lee) expressing support for the provision of humanitarian assistance to Caribbean nations devastated by the storms. Subsequently, Congress approved $100 million in emergency supplemental funding for the region in the aftermath of the storms (H.R. 4837, P.L. 108-324). (For additional information, see CRS Report RL32160, Caribbean Region: Issues in U.S. Relations.)

The Bush Administration's new foreign aid initiative, the Millennium Challenge Account (MCA), could significantly increase U.S. foreign assistance worldwide to countries that have strong records of performance in the areas of governance, economic policy and investment in people. The initiative could dramatically increase foreign assistance to several Latin American countries beginning in FY2004. In May 2004, the Millennium Challenge Corporation (MCC) board deemed three Latin American nations — Bolivia, Honduras, and Nicaragua — as eligible to apply for MCA funding in FY2004. (For further information, see CRS Report RL31687, The Millennium Challenge Account: Congressional Consideration of a New Foreign Aid Initiative, by Larry Nowels.)

Some Members of Congress have wanted to increase U.S. assistance to combat poverty in Latin America. In the 108th Congress, the House Subcommittee on the Western Hemisphere approved an initiative, H.R. 3447 (Menendez), that would authorize $500 million annually for five years for a Social Investment and Economic Development Fund for the Americas to provide assistance for poverty reduction and increased economic opportunity in the region.

On January 7, 2004, President Bush proposed a new temporary worker program that would allow undocumented persons in the United States, and foreign workers, to work for a period of three years (which would be renewable one time) and receive legal temporary status. The proposal is somewhat similar to legislation proposed by Senator McCain, S. 1461, and Representatives Kolbe and Flake, H.R. 2899. Mexican President Vicente Fox reacted positively to the proposal. Observers contend that prospects for Congress to approve such legislation this year are unlikely, given opposition from those who want to provide broader amnesty to undocumented workers in the United States as well as from those who believe that such a proposal constitutes a reward to those people living in the United States illegally.<sup>3</sup>

President Bush met with other hemispheric leaders at a Special Summit of the Americas held in Monterrey Mexico from January 12-13, 2004. The leaders issued the Declaration of Nuevo León, which set forth reaffirmations and commitments in the three areas of economic growth with equity, social development, and democratic governance. Among the measures agreed upon was a commitment to reduce the cost of sending remittances in the region by at least half by 2008. The Declaration also supported a tripling of Inter-American Development Bank lending to micro, small, and medium-sized enterprises. While the Declaration included a commitment “to deny safe haven to corrupt officials, to those who corrupt them, and their assets,” it did not include a U.S. proposal that would have barred corrupt officials from taking part in hemispheric meetings. In addition, although the Declaration welcomed progress toward the establishment of a FTAA, it did not include a U.S. proposal to note a January 2005 deadline for the agreement.<sup>4</sup>

Some observers, including many from Latin America, maintain that the Bush Administration has not been paying enough attention to the region and to the problems of economic and political stability in several countries. U.S. policy is criticized for having returned to a policy of benign neglect as the Administration has focused its attention on such pressing problems as the global anti-terrorism campaign, the war in Iraq, and homeland security. They argue that the United States cannot afford to let the region become unstable politically or economically, because it is an important market for U.S. exports, and an important supplier of U.S. energy needs, and increased instability could lead to increased illegal migration.

Others suggest that despite its attention to crises and issues worldwide, the United States has maintained an active policy toward Latin America. They point to the momentum for free trade in the region and to the assistance and support provided to Colombia and its neighbors as they combat drug trafficking and terrorist groups in the Andean region. They maintain that the new U.S. focus on security issues worldwide will only solidify U.S. ties to the region through increased bilateral and regional cooperation such as the Inter-American Convention Against Terrorism.

---

<sup>3</sup> “Committed White House Push a Must for Immigration Plan,” CQ Weekly, Jan. 10, 2004.

<sup>4</sup> Organization of American States, Declaration of Nuevo León, Jan. 13, 2004; Tim Weiner, “Bush Meets Skepticism on Free Trade at Americas Conference,” New York Times, Jan. 14, 2004; Richard Boudreaux, “The Americas’ New Left Challenges Bush,” Los Angeles Times, Jan. 14, 2004.

CRS Products:

- CRS Report RL32001, AIDS in the Caribbean and Central America, by Mark P. Sullivan.
- CRS Report RL32160, Caribbean Region: Issues in U.S. Relations, by Mark P. Sullivan.
- CRS Report RL32038, Drug Certification/Designation Procedures for Illicit Narcotics Producing and Transit Countries, by K. Larry Storrs.
- CRS Report RL31659, Foreign Remittances to Latin America, by Walter W. Eubanks and Pauline Smale.
- CRS Report RL32044, Immigration: Policy Considerations Related to Guest Worker Programs, by Andorra Bruno.
- CRS Report 98-684, Latin America and the Caribbean: Fact Sheet on Leaders and Elections, by Mark P. Sullivan.
- CRS Report RL30971, Latin America and the Caribbean: Legislative Issues in 2001-2002, Coordinated by K. Larry Storrs.
- CRS Report RS21049, Latin America: Terrorism Issues, by Mark P. Sullivan.
- CRS Report RS21700, Special Summit of the Americas — Monterrey, Mexico, January 2004: Background and Objectives, by Clare Ribando.
- CRS Issue Brief IB95017, Trade and the Americas, by Raymond J. Ahearn.
- CRS Report RL32487, U.S. Foreign Assistance to Latin America and the Caribbean, coordinated by Connie Veillette.

Regional Issues

Colombia and the Andean Counterdrug Initiative

Congress has expressed concern about the problem of illegal narcotics in the Andean Region and divided over an appropriate policy. For over two decades, U.S. policy towards the Andean Region has focused almost exclusively on counternarcotics efforts, that is, curbing the cultivation of coca leaf, its transformation into cocaine, and its subsequent trafficking. Success in controlling coca and coca base production in Bolivia and Peru seemed to be offset in the mid-to-late 1990s by the expansion of coca cultivation into uncontrolled areas of Colombia, which previously had served only for the refinement of coca base into cocaine. In the last few years, drug traffickers have also begun to cultivate opium poppies and transform them into high-grade heroin in Colombia. Eighty percent of the world's cocaine originates in Colombia.

In 2000, the 106th Congress approved expanded political, economic, and military assistance to combat drug production and trafficking in Colombia under the Clinton Administration's proposal to support Plan Colombia (P.L. 106-246), an initiative of then President Pastrana of Colombia (1998-2002). In 2002, it approved the Bush Administration's Andean Regional Initiative (ARI), the continuation of the Clinton policy in Colombia and a sizable expansion of assistance to six of Colombia's neighbors: Brazil, Bolivia, Ecuador, Panama, Peru, and Venezuela (P.L. 107-206 and P.L. 107-115). ARI funding included antinarcotics assistance, known as the Andean Counterdrug Initiative (ACI), as well as Foreign Military Financing, Development Assistance, Child Survival and Health funds, and Economic Support Funds. The 107th Congress also approved a major shift in U.S. Andean policy by authorizing the use of U.S. assistance to help Colombia counter threats to its stability from illegal armed groups of the left and right which substantially finance their operations through the drug trade.

The 108th Congress continued to scrutinize indicators of the effectiveness of U.S. assistance to the Andean region. (For FY2004, the Bush Administration budget request did not use the term "Andean Regional Initiative," instead making separate requests for the Andean Counterdrug Initiative, Foreign Military Financing, and the other development assistance programs from their regular accounts.) According to United States and Colombian officials, coca cultivation dropped 15% in Colombia during 2002 and 21% in 2003. This marked the first reduction in acreage devoted to coca cultivation in Colombia. Poppy cultivation was reduced by 24% in 2002. It is believed that the Plan Colombia goal of having sprayed 50% of the country's coca crop by the end of 2005 may have been accomplished two years ahead of schedule. It should be noted that spraying does not prevent, although it may discourage, the replanting of illicit crops. However, according to the Administration, during 2002 and 2003, coca cultivation picked up in Bolivia, reversing a declining trend there. Peru's coca cultivation in 2003 decreased 15%.

Critics of U.S. policy contend that winning the war against drugs is a losing proposition as long as demand continues. They argue that policy should focus on the "demand side" because they view providing treatment for the users of illegal narcotics as the only permanent solution. The Bush Administration has, however, recast the debate, arguing that the United States faces not only a threat from drug production and trafficking in the Andean region, but also from the increasing instability brought on by insurgent guerrilla organizations that are fueled by the drug trade. To the Bush Administration and its supporters, the assistance to Colombia is necessary to help shore up a democratic government besieged by drug-supported leftist and rightist armed groups. Substantial assistance to Colombia's neighbors is warranted, they argue, because of an increasing threat from the spillover of violence from Colombia, and the possible resurgence of drug cultivation in some countries and its spread from Colombia to others.

Although some critics agree with this assessment, they argue that the Bush plan overemphasizes military and counter-drug assistance and provides inadequate support for protecting human rights and encouraging a peace process in Colombia. In particular, they express concern that current military assistance is drawing the United States into Colombia's guerrilla conflict in support of armed forces which, they charge, have substantial ties to rightist groups guilty of gross violations of human rights. This concern grew with the August 2002 inauguration of President Alvaro Uribe, who is viewed by some as tolerating the actions of rightist armed groups, despite his statements that he will neither tolerate violence against nor on behalf of the government. In July 2003, President Uribe announced that an agreement had been reached with the rightist paramilitary umbrella organization, the United Self Defense Forces of Colombia (AUC), that would result in its disarmament by the end of 2005. Part of the demobilization plan entails a controversial legislative proposal by President Uribe to grant conditional amnesties to illegal combatants who disarm and provide some form of restitution under court supervision. Critics also voice skepticism that U.S.-funded aerial fumigation and alternative development projects can effectively cut coca and poppy cultivation, and provide adequate livelihoods to induce growers to voluntarily give up illicit crops.

ACI and Related Funding Programs. The United States has made a significant commitment of funds and material support to help Colombia and the Andean region fight drug trafficking since the development of Plan Colombia in 1999. Congress passed legislation providing $1.3 billion in assistance for FY2000 (P.L. 106-246) and has provided a total of $3.7 billion from FY2000 through FY2004 in both State Department and Defense Department counternarcotics accounts. Since 2002, Congress has granted expanded authority to use counternarcotics funds for a unified campaign to fight both drug trafficking and terrorist organizations in Colombia. The three main guerrilla groups in Colombia participate in drug production and trafficking, and have been designated foreign terrorist organizations by the State Department. For FY2004, Congress approved $731 million for the Andean Counterdrug Initiative (P.L. 108-199). The request for FY2005 maintains that same level of funding. The House-passed FY2005 Foreign Operations appropriations bill, H.R. 4818, approved July 15, 2004, would fully fund the requested amount.

The ACI account funds, among other things, support for the eradication of illegal crops and the destruction of laboratories, as well as economic and social development. Congress also approved $110 million in FY2004 in Foreign Military Financing (FMF) for Colombia. In the past, FMF funding has been used to train and equip a Colombian Army brigade to protect the Caño-Limón oil pipeline in Colombia. The FMF request for FY2005 is $108 million. Congress has regularly maintained a number of provisions relating to human rights, aerial fumigation, and prohibiting U.S. military personnel from participating in combat operations. Current law also imposed a cap of 400 each on U.S. military and civilian personnel deployed in support of Plan Colombia (P.L. 106-246, Section 3204(b)through(d) as amended by P.L. 107-115). In response to an Administration request, Congress approved increasing the cap on military personnel to 800 and contract employees to 600 in the FY2005 National Defense Authorization Act (P.L. 108-375, H.R. 4200, H.Rept. 108-767).

The Killing and Capture of U.S. Citizens. Congress has expressed repeated concerns regarding the capture and killing of various U.S. citizens by the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC), the first case occurred on February 13, 2003. On that morning, a Cessna 208 aircraft carrying four American contractors and a Colombian crash landed in the Colombian province of Caquetá. The pilot and one of the contractors were shot, the other three contractors were captured by the FARC. Subsequently, in March 2003, three more American contractors were killed in a plane crash as they were searching for the captured contractors. Both planes involved in these crashes were Cessna 208s, which some contract employees have complained are not suitable for use in Colombia because they cannot perform the steep climbs required by mountainous terrain. A fifth American was killed in April 2003 when his T-65 air tractor crashed while spraying opium poppies. While these flights were considered accidents, fumigation flights have been fired on, and since August 2003, two planes have been downed by hostile fire. On August 25, 2003, a spray aircraft piloted by a U.S. citizen was shot down, resulting in injuries to the pilot. An OV Bronco aircraft was downed on September 21, 2003, reportedly by hostile fire, killing its Costa Rican pilot. The ELN claimed responsibility for the shutdown.<sup>5</sup> Kidnappings of Colombians, including several government officials, and foreigners persist.

Air Bridge Denial Program. Following the April 2001 accidental shooting down of an airplane carrying U.S. missionaries in Peru by the Peruvian military working with U.S. assistance, the Air Bridge Denial Program, an effort to intercept drug trafficking flights, was suspended in both Peru and Colombia. Congress inserted language in the foreign aid funding bills requiring that safety enhancements be instituted before such flights could resume in Peru. Although discussions are still ongoing with Peru, Secretary of State Powell recommended to President Bush on August 5, 2003, that flights be resumed in Colombia after agreement was reached with Colombian authorities on protocols to ensure enhanced safety. The program resumed soon thereafter. The FY2005 request is for $21 million.

---

<sup>5</sup> "ELN - We Shot Down U.S. Anti-Drug Plane," EFE News Service, Oct. 3, 2003.

CRS Products:

CRS Report RL32337, Andean Counterdrug Initiative (ACI) and Related Funding Programs: FY2005 Assistance, by Connie Veillette.

CRS Report RL32021, Andean Regional Initiative (ARI): FY2003 Supplemental and FY2004 Assistance for Colombia and Neighbors, by K. Larry Storrs and Connie Veillette.

CRS Report RL31383, Andean Regional Initiative (ARI): FY2002 Supplemental and FY2003 Assistance for Colombia and Neighbors, by K. Larry Storrs and Nina M. Serafino.

CRS Report RL31016, Andean Regional Initiative (ARI): FY2002 Assistance for Colombia and Neighbors, by K. Larry Storrs and Nina M. Serafino.

CRS Report RL32250, Colombia: Issues for Congress, by Connie Veillette.

CRS Report RL32052, Colombia and Aerial Eradication of Drug Crops: U.S. Policy and Issues, by Connie Veillette and José E. Arvelo-Velez.

CRS Report RS21213, Colombia: Summary and Tables on U.S. Assistance, FY1989-FY2003, by Nina M. Serafino.

U.S.-Latin American Trade Relations

Since the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) took effect in January 1994, its mixed reviews have been one factor that has caused the U.S. Congress to adopt a more cautious attitude toward future trade negotiations. This outlook was reflected in the spirited debate over Trade Promotion Authority (TPA), which continued for eight years before legislation permitting “fast-track” approval of trade agreements was passed in August 2002. It was also seen in the debate that emerged over the implementing legislation for the U.S.-Chile FTA that was passed by Congress in July 2003. In the meantime, the Bush Administration is pursuing other FTAs with Latin America and since all will require congressional approval before they can take effect, the 108th Congress has followed each with some care.

U.S.-Chile FTA. On January 1, 2004, the U.S.-Chile free trade agreement (FTA) went into effect. The United States and Chile signed the long anticipated FTA in Miami, Florida on June 6, 2003, concluding a 14-round negotiation process that began on December 6, 2000. Congress held hearings before the House Ways and Means, Senate Finance, and both Judiciary Committees. The House passed the U.S.-Chile Free Trade Implementation Act (H.R. 2738) on July 24, 2003 by a vote of 270 to 156, followed by the Senate one week later, 66 to 31. President George W. Bush signed the implementing legislation into law (P.L. 108-77) on September 3, 2003. The FTA allows 85% of all consumer and industrial goods to be traded duty free immediately, with 75% of tariffs on farm goods and Chile’s luxury tax on automobiles to be eliminated within the first four years, and tariffs on sensitive goods traded between the two countries to be phased out over a period of up to 12 years.

Chile's rules governing investment, services trade, intellectual property rights, labor, environment, dispute resolution, and other issues critical to the United States are also clarified and made more transparent. There are no provisions on antidumping or countervailing duties, key trade issues for Chile and Latin America in general. Because multiple FTAs are now being contemplated, some Members of Congress expressed serious reservations about certain provisions in the U.S.-Chile agreement becoming "templates" for future FTAs. In particular, congressional hearings focused on provisions related to labor, capital controls, and the temporary entry for business persons.

U.S.-Dominican Republic-Central America FTA (DR-CAFTA). On December 17, 2003, the United States concluded negotiations on a U.S.-Central America Free Trade Agreement (CAFTA) with four of the five Central American Common Market (CACM) countries (Guatemala, Honduras, El Salvador, and Nicaragua). Costa Rica agreed to CAFTA on January 25, 2004, following additional bilateral discussions with the United States on various sensitive issues. The agreement was signed by all five parties on May 28, 2004, at the Organization of American States in Washington, D.C. Separately, the United States and the Dominican Republic on March 15, 2004, concluded negotiations on a similar FTA. On August 5, 2004, all seven countries signed the U.S.-Dominican Republic-Central America Free Trade Agreement (DR-CAFTA). The combined agreement is to be presented as a single legislative package, but because of its controversial nature, it seems unlikely that any action will occur in the 108th Congress.

The DR-CAFTA negotiations were ground breaking in trying to reconcile the needs of five (and eventually six) different U.S. trading partners within a "bilateral" framework. DR-CAFTA was negotiated in part as a regional agreement in which all parties would be subject to the same basic framework and rules, but each country was also able to define its own market access schedules. This flexibility allowed Costa Rica to delay joining the agreement and for the Dominican Republic to be added as a new partner because it acceded to "the same set of obligations and commitments," but also appended a separately negotiated schedule for market access.

If DR-CAFTA is implemented, more than 80% of U.S. consumer and industrial exports would become duty-free immediately, with all tariffs removed within 10 years. Tariffs would go to zero on information technology products, agricultural and construction equipment, paper products, chemicals, and medical/scientific equipment, among others. Over half of current U.S. farm exports to the region would become duty free immediately, including "high quality" cuts of beef, cotton, wheat, soybeans, certain fruits, and vegetables, processed food products, and wine. At the same time, the United States conceded to slight increases in sugar quotas. Advances were also made in other areas important to the United States including services trade, intellectual property rights, investment, and government procurement.

DR-CAFTA, however, faces political uncertainty. In the United States, groups oppose liberalizing trade rules for the region's major exports, apparel and agricultural goods, and there is also considerable resistance to the agreement from labor advocates. For the U.S. Congress, reconciling these diverse interests is a difficult task given the competing nature of the negotiating goals. Also, support for the agreement has been jeopardized by the Dominican Republic's passage of a revenue bill that includes a 25% tax on beverages containing high fructose corn syrup. The USTR considers this tax “to be inconsistent with the Dominican Republic’s obligations under the agreement” and has recommended to Congress that implementing legislation not include the Dominican Republic unless the tax is repealed. The possibility of dropping the Dominican Republic from the FTA has raised serious concerns with some Members of Congress.

Panama and Andean Free Trade Agreements. The Bush Administration has begun trade negotiations for bilateral agreements with both Panama and select Andean countries. Discussions with Panama began in late April 2004 and five rounds have been completed. Negotiations have moved quickly largely because the basic framework of the DR-CAFTA agreement has been used as a model. Sensitive negotiating areas include market access, agriculture, and maritime issues. Negotiations with Colombia, Peru, and Ecuador were initiated in May 2004; Bolivia may join them at some future date. It is too early to know what this agreement will look like, but the framework will not likely vary dramatically from that of the Chile and Central American agreements, except to accommodate specific market access and other schedules on a bilateral basis.

Free Trade Area of the Americas. The Free Trade Area of the Americas is a regional trade proposal among 34 nations of the Western Hemisphere that would promote economic integration by creating, as originally conceived, a comprehensive (presumably WTO-plus) framework for reducing tariff and nontariff barriers to trade and investment. Formal negotiations commenced in 1998 and the process so far has led to three draft texts, the last released at the eighth trade ministerial meeting that took place November 17-21, 2003, in Miami. The negotiating schedule calls for a final agreement to be adopted by January 2005, with its entry into force to occur no later than year end. The FTAA negotiations, however, are at a crossroads. Brazil and the United States, the co-chairs of the Trade Negotiations Committee (TNC) that oversees the process, are at odds over how to proceed and it appears increasingly likely that the 2005 deadline will be missed.

Brazil has taken strong exception to the U.S. approach to the FTAA, particularly its firm stand of refusing to discuss agricultural subsidies, antidumping legislation, and alternatives to its “differentiated market access” proposal, which, Brazil argued, would place it in a group of South American countries with the least favorable tariff phase-out schedule. Brazil responded with its own “Three Track Proposal,” which would eliminate discussion in the FTAA of many issues of importance to the United States. To avoid an impasse, the United States and Brazil jointly authored the Ministerial Declaration of the eighth ministerial meeting held in Miami on November 20-21, 2003, which defined how the FTAA negotiations will proceed. Although it reaffirms the commitment to complete a “comprehensive and balanced” agreement by January 2005, it does so in the context of a rather unorthodox compromise. The declaration states that “countries may assume different levels of commitments...[with a] common set of rights and obligations applicable to all countries...[and may also] choose, within the FTAA, to agree to additional obligations and benefits.” The additional obligations may be defined in plurilateral negotiations, with a country’s benefits being linked to the obligations it undertakes. The TNC was instructed to define the common set of rights and obligations for all nine negotiating areas, but to date has postponed meeting formally until details of the framework can be reached to the satisfaction of both the United States and Brazil.

Depending on one's viewpoint, this resolution may be considered a success or a disappointment. Trade advocates may see the process moving ahead, but have registered concerns that an "FTAA-lite" may emerge, diluting many of the anticipated benefits. Trade skeptics seem to be heartened by the same prospect. In any case, a middle ground has emerged that was not initially contemplated, largely because of tension that arose between Brazil and the United States. Both countries are pursuing, and in some cases competing for, parallel bilateral negotiations with select Latin American countries, which could result in an awkward and inefficient hub-and-spoke regional trading system.

CRS Products:

CRS Report RL32322, Central America and the Dominican Republic in the Context of the Free Trade Agreement (DR-CAFTA) with the United States, coordinated by K. Larry Storrs.

CRS Report RS20864, A Free Trade Area of the Americas: Status of Negotiations and Major Policy Issues, by J. F. Hornbeck.

CRS Report RS21737, NAFTA at Ten: Lessons from Recent Studies, by J. F. Hornbeck.

CRS Report RL32540, The Proposed U.S.-Panama Free Trade Agreement, by J. F. Hornbeck.

CRS Issue Brief IB95017, Trade and the Americas, by Raymond J. Ahearn.

CRS Report RL31870, The U.S.-Central America Free Trade Agreement (CAFTA): Challenges for Sub-Regional Integration, by J. F. Hornbeck.

CRS Report RL31144, A U.S.-Chile Free Trade Agreement: Economic and Trade Policy Issues, by J. F. Hornbeck.

CRS Electronic Briefing Book on Trade, "The U.S.-Dominican Republic-Central America Free Trade Agreement," by J.F. Hornbeck,
[<http://www.congress.gov/brbk/html/ebtra132.html>]

CRS Report RS21868, U.S.-Dominican Republic Free-Trade Agreement, by Leonore Sek.

CRS Report 98-840, U.S.-Latin American Trade: Recent Trends, by J. F. Hornbeck.

Terrorism

In the aftermath of the September 2001 terrorist attacks on New York and Washington D.C., U.S. attention to terrorism in Latin America has intensified, with an increase in bilateral and regional cooperation. Latin American nations strongly condemned the attacks, and took action through the Organization of American States to strengthen hemispheric cooperation. In June 2002, OAS members signed an Inter-American Convention Against Terrorism that would improve regional cooperation, including a commitment by parties to deny safe haven to suspected terrorists. President Bush submitted the convention to the Senate in mid-November 2002 for its advice and consent, which was referred to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee (Treaty Doc. 107-18); the committee held a hearing on the treaty on June 17, 2004. In the aftermath of 9/11, the OAS reinvigorated the Inter-American Committee on Terrorism (CICTE), which has cooperated on border security mechanisms, controls to prevent funding of terrorist organizations, and law enforcement and counterterrorism intelligence.

On October 27-28, 2003, the OAS held a Special Conference on Security in Mexico City that focused on identifying new threats, concerns and challenges facing the hemisphere and agreed on a cooperative approach toward addressing them. Among the threats identified in the adopted Declaration on Security in the Americas were “terrorism, transnational organized crime, the global drug problem, corruption, asset laundering, illicit trafficking in weapons and the connections among these activities.”<sup>6</sup>

The State Department, in its annual report on worldwide terrorism (Patterns of Global Terrorism, April 2004), highlights terrorist threats in Colombia, Peru, and the tri-border region of Argentina, Brazil, and Paraguay, which has been a regional hub for Hizballah and Hamas fundraising activities. In the aftermath of 9/11, U.S. attention focused on potential links in the region to the Al Qaeda terrorist network, but the Patterns report maintains that reports of an Al Qaeda presence in the tri-border region remain “uncorroborated by intelligence and law-enforcement officials.” The State Department also has designated four terrorist groups (three in Colombia and one in Peru) as Foreign Terrorist Organizations, and Cuba has been listed as a state sponsor of terrorism since 1982.

There have been increased concerns in 2004 about potential Al Qaeda threats in Central America, although U.S. officials maintain that there has been no evidence supporting such concerns. Honduras declared a terror alert on August 23, 2004, after receiving information that Al Qaeda reportedly was attempting to recruit Hondurans to attack U.S. and other embassies.<sup>7</sup> In June, Honduran officials said that a suspected terrorist cell leader, Adman G. El Shukrijumah had been spotted at an Internet café. In August, El Salvador received threats from an Islamic extremist group to carry out attacks in the country if it did not pull its troops out of Iraq. Some press reports have alleged that Al-Qaeda may be attempting to use a Salvadoran criminal gang, the Mara

---

<sup>6</sup> Organization of American States. Declaration on Security in the Americas. Oct. 28, 2003.

<sup>7</sup> “Honduras: Terror Alert Issued After Al-Qaida Tip-Off,” Latinnews-Daily, August 24, 2004.

Salvatrucha, to infiltrate the U.S.-Mexico border, although Secretary of Homeland Security Tom Ridge maintained on September 27, 2004, that there was no indication of such infiltration along the border.<sup>8</sup> Moreover, the head of Interpol's regional office in Central America stated in early October 2004 that reports of an Al Qaeda links with Central American gangs are mere speculation, with no firm basis in evidence.<sup>9</sup>

Through the State Department, the United States has provided Anti-Terrorism Assistance (ATA) training and equipment to Latin American countries to help improve their capabilities in such areas as airport security management, hostage negotiations, bomb detection and deactivation, and countering terrorism financing. ATA financing is generally provided through the annual foreign operations appropriations measure. In FY2002, a total of $27.5 million was provided for the region, with $25 million for an anti-kidnapping program in Colombia (appropriated through an FY2002 supplemental appropriations measure, P.L. 107-206) and $2.5 million for the regular Western Hemisphere program. For FY2003, the Administration's $3.6 million in ATA assistance was provided for the region, with $3.3 million of that for Colombia. For FY2004, an estimated $2.6 million in ATA assistance will be provided for the Western Hemisphere, while the Administration has requested $5.2 million for FY2005, including $1 million for the tri-border region of Brazil, Paraguay, and Argentina, and $3.9 million for Colombia.

In the 108th Congress, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee report (S.Rept. 108-56) to S. 1161, the Foreign Relations Authorization Act for FY2004, urges the Department of State to pay particular attention to training and related equipment for countering terrorist financing, transitional crime intelligence sharing, and border security in the Tri-border area. As noted above, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee held a June 17, 2004, hearing on the Inter-American Convention Against Terrorism.

The U.S. Congress also has expressed concern regarding the continuing investigation into the July 1994 bombing of the Argentine-Israeli Mutual Association (AMIA) in Buenos Aires that killed 86 people. (Allegations have linked Hizballah, the radical Lebanon-based Islamic group, to the 1994 bombing as well as to the 1992 bombing of the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aires that killed 30 people.) Both the House and the Senate approved similar resolutions — H.Con.Res. 469 (Ros-Lehtinen) and S.Con.Res. 126 (Coleman) — on July 22, 2004, that, among other provisions, urged Argentina to provide resources to investigate all areas of the AMIA case, encourage U.S. law enforcement support, and encourage the establishment of an OAS task force to assist in the investigation.

---

<sup>8</sup> "U.S. Officials Dispute Al Qaeda Role in Hemisphere," Homeland Security Monitor (Intellibridge), September 30, 2004; Jerry Seper, "Al Qaeda Seeks Tie to Local Gangs." Washington Times, September 28, 2004.

<sup>9</sup> "No Clear Evidence Terrorists are Present," Miami Herald, October 7, 2004.

CRS Products:

CRS Report RS21049, Latin America: Terrorism Issues, by Mark P. Sullivan.

AIDS in the Caribbean and Central America

The AIDS epidemic in the Caribbean and Central America has begun to have negative consequences for economic and social development, and continued increases in infection rates threaten future development prospects. In contrast to other parts of Latin America, the mode of transmission in several Caribbean and Central American countries has been primarily through heterosexual contact, making the disease difficult to contain because it affects the general population. The Caribbean countries with the highest prevalence or infection rates are Haiti, with a rate of 5.6%; Trinidad and Tobago, with a rate of 3.2%; the Bahamas, with a rate of 3%; Guyana, with a rate of 2.5%; and Belize, with a rate of 2.4%. (Belize and Guyana are considered Caribbean nations because of their extensive linkages.) Four other Caribbean countries — the Dominican Republic, Suriname, Barbados, and Jamaica — have rates over 1%. In Central America, Honduras has the highest prevalence rate of 1.8%, while Guatemala has a rate over 1%.

The response to the AIDS epidemic in the Caribbean and Central America has involved a mix of support by governments in the region, bilateral donors (such as the United States, Canada, and European nations), regional and multilateral organizations, and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs). Many countries in the region have national AIDS programs that are supported through these efforts.

The U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID) has been the lead U.S. agency fighting the epidemic abroad since 1986. USAID's funding for HIV/AIDS in Central America and the Caribbean region rose from $11.2 million in FY2000 to $33.8 million in FY2003. Because of the inclusion of Guyana and Haiti in the President's Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief (PEPFAR), FY2004 U.S. assistance to the region for HIV/AIDS increased to an estimated $56.6 million, and the FY2005 request increased to $86 million.

In May 2003, Congress approved the United States Leadership Against HIV/AIDS, Tuberculosis, and Malaria Act of 2003, H.R. 1298 (P.L. 108-25), which authorized $3 billion per year for FY2003 through FY2008 to fight the three diseases worldwide. PEPFAR and the legislation focus on assisting 12 African countries plus Guyana and Haiti, although the legislation notes that other countries may be designated by the President. Some Members of Congress want to expand the list of Caribbean countries in the legislation. Both the House-passed FY2004-FY2005 Foreign Relations Authorization Act, H.R. 1950 (Section 1818), and the Senate Foreign Relations Committee's reported FY2005 Foreign Relations Authorization Act, S. 2144 (Section 2518), have provisions that would add 14 Caribbean countries to those listed in the May 2003 legislation.

CRS Products:

CRS Report RL32001, AIDS in the Caribbean and Central America, by Mark P. Sullivan.

Country Issues

Argentina

Although Argentina has emerged from its 2001-2002 economic and political crisis, the current administration of President Néstor Kirchner faces considerable challenges. These include the ability to build the political consensus needed in order to ensure sustainable economic growth and financial stability and the ability to negotiate a debt restructuring deal for over $100 billion in defaulted bond debt.

A center-left Peronist (Justicialist Party or PJ), Kirchner had emerged from a crowded April 2003 presidential race with 22% of the vote and was inaugurated to a four-year term on May 25, 2003. He succeeded another Peronist, Eduardo Duhalde, who had become President in January 2002 in the aftermath of the resignation of President Fernando de la Rúa of the Radical Civic Union (UCR) in December 2001. Social protests over deteriorating economic conditions had led to De la Rúa's resignation. Although the country was under considerable stress in 2001 and 2002, the democratic political system weathered the crisis and economic growth has resumed from a decline of almost 11% in 2002 to an estimated increase of over 7% in 2003. The forecast for 2004 is for economic growth of 7%.

President Kirchner's bold policy moves in the areas of human rights and institutional reform have helped restore Argentines' faith in government. He has vowed to prosecute military officials responsible for past human rights violations during the last era of military rule (1976-1983). In the economic arena, the Kirchner government reached a three-year stand-by agreement with the International Monetary Fund (IMF) in September 2003, after several months of tough negotiations, that provided credit line of about $12.5 billion. Although IMF accords are not normally politically popular, the accord was widely praised in Argentina as an agreement with realistic fiscal targets that would enable Argentina to deal with such issues as employment and social equity.

President Kirchner's popularity, which remains measured over 80% in March 2004 because of his human rights efforts and economic success, declined to about 63% in July 2004 because of concerns over the government's policy of tolerance toward the "piquetero" (picketeer) protest movement.<sup>10</sup> The piquetero movement, made up of the ranks of Argentina's unemployed, played an instrumental role in the resignation of President De la Rúa in 2001.

---

<sup>10</sup> "Argentina: Presidential Approval Ratings Are Down," Oxford Analytica, July 16, 2004.

On the economic front, Argentina suspended its IMF loan program in mid-August 2004 because of IMF pressure on its debt negotiations with bondholders and on Argentine progress in implementing key economic reforms. The IMF had delayed its third review of the stand-by agreement because of concerns about these issues; the delay held up disbursement of $778 million to Argentina under the agreement. Argentina expects to renew talks with the IMF in December or January 2005, after it has made progress in restructuring its $100 billion in defaulted bond debt. The bondholders had strongly criticized the terms of Argentina's initial restructuring proposal, which included a 75% "haircut" or debt reduction. A new Argentine proposal in early June 2004 included an agreement to pay billions in unpaid interest, but the proposal again was criticized by many bondholders; a formal launching of the proposal is expected in late November 2004. Although Argentina's economic recovery has enabled it to achieve the macroeconomic targets set by the IMF, many poor and middle-class Argentines have yet to see major improvements in living standards. The country has an unemployment rate of 20% and some 48% of the population are reportedly living below the poverty line.<sup>11</sup>

U.S.-Argentine relations have been strong since the country's return to democracy in 1983 and were especially close during the Menem presidency. The tough U.S. approach toward Argentina during its political and financial crisis in 2001-2002 caused some friction in the bilateral relationship and contributed to an increase of anti-Americanism in Argentina. At present, despite strong bilateral relations, there have been several irritants in the relationship, such as Argentina's closer relations with Cuba. U.S. officials have urged both the Argentine government and its private creditors to move expeditiously to work out a fair and mutually agreeable debt restructuring agreement, which they believe is critical to ensuring Argentina's continued economic recovery.

As noted above (section on Terrorism), Congress has expressed concern regarding the continuing investigation into the July 1994 bombing in Buenos Aires of the Argentine-Israeli Mutual Association (AMIA) that killed 86 people. Both the House and the Senate approved similar resolutions — H.Con.Res. 469 (Ros-Lehtinen) and S.Con.Res. 126 (Coleman) — on July 22, 2004, that urged Argentina to provide resources to investigate all areas of the AMIA case, encourage U.S. law enforcement support, and encourage the establishment of an OAS task force to assist in the investigation.

---

<sup>11</sup> Reed Lindsay, "Economic Pit a Steep Climb; Signs of Recovery Only a Glimmer to Argentina's Poor, Middle Class," Washington Times, May 18, 2004.

CRS Products:

CRS Report RS21113, Argentina: Political Conditions and U.S. Relations, by Mark P. Sullivan.

CRS Report RL32637, Argentina's Sovereign Debt Restructuring, by J.F. Hornbeck.

CRS Report RS21072, The Financial Crisis in Argentina, by J. F. Hornbeck.

CRS Report RL31582, The Argentine Financial Crisis: A Chronology of Events, by J. F. Hornbeck.

Bolivia

Political unrest in Bolivia led to the resignation of President Gonzalo Sanchez de Lozada on October 17, 2003, just fifteen months after he was elected. Succeeding him as President is his former Vice President, Carlos Mesa, a popular former television journalist, historian, and political independent. This change in leadership came about after months of protests led by indigenous groups and workers who carried out strikes and road blockages that resulted in up to 80 deaths in confrontations with government troops. The focus of the protests was the continued economic marginalization of the poorer segments of society especially in response to government plans to export natural gas via a port in Chile, an historic adversary of Bolivia. The new President faces many difficulties in governing a politically fractured society within a context of a highly mobilized indigenous community, and the uncertainty of being able to obtain consensus on natural gas exports as a basis for the country's future economic development. The change in government and the role that indigenous groups played in it represents challenges for U.S. policy, which has been seen as focusing almost exclusively on coca eradication and less on equitable economic development policies.

CRS Products:

CRS Report RS21660, Bolivia: Political Developments and Implications for U.S. Policy, by Connie Veillette.

Brazil

Luis Inácio Lula da Silva of the leftist Workers' Party (PT) was inaugurated President of Brazil on January 1, 2003, pledging to bring fundamental change to the country while maintaining sound economic policies. He won the October 2002 elections decisively, with the support of leftist parties and a variety of centrist elements. As he sought to fashion support for his programs in Congress, he reached out beyond the parties that supported him in the election to other centrist parties, especially the centrist PMDB, but the alliance was strained by the October 2004 municipal elections.

During his nearly two years in office, President Lula da Silva has pursued cautious economic policies and met and even surpassed previously established targets for International Monetary Fund (IMF) loans, while stressing that one of his main priorities is the eradication of hunger in the country through programs called Zero Hunger and Family Payments. As a result of his policies, the country has experienced lower inflation, a strengthening of the currency, and a dramatic lowering of Brazil's credit risk rating. Tackling long-standing problems that were not resolved during the presidency of Fernando Henrique Cardoso (1995-2002), President Lula da Silva obtained a reform of the social security system to make it self-sustaining and a modification of the tax system to make it more effective and fair. While economic growth was only 0.3 percent in 2003, most observers expect 3.5-4% growth in 2004, although interest rates and unemployment rates have remained fairly high. To guarantee against external shocks to the heavily indebted economy, in early November 2003, Brazil agreed to extend the loan with the IMF and to maintain the previous austere fiscal targets. Under the agreement, Brazil would have available about $20 billion in resources, including a rollover of $8 billion from the past loan, about $6 billion in fresh funds, and postponement of payment of $5.5 billion due in 2005. Brazilian Finance Minister Palocci argues that the loan is an insurance package and notes that Brazil may not draw upon the funds.

Relations with the United States have been generally positive and constructive, although President Lula da Silva has made relations with the neighboring countries in the Southern Common Market (Mercosur) his first priority, has orchestrated the linking of the Mercosur with the Andean Community of Nations (CAN), and has been seeking to strengthen ties with the European Union and with other non-traditional partners, including India and China. On June 20, 2003, President Lula da Silva made an official visit to Washington, D.C., and the countries' leaders resolved "to create a closer and qualitatively stronger [bilateral] relationship." Leaders agreed on a framework for regular high-level discussions on a wide range of issues, including agreements to enhance cooperation in science and nuclear energy; to jointly promote HIV/AIDS treatment in the Portuguese-speaking African countries of Mozambique and Angola; and to establish an energy partnership for cooperation on alternative energy sources. On October 4-6, 2004, Secretary of State Colin Powell visited Brazil for high level discussions on international trade, hunger, and security matters, as well as Brazil's leading role in the U.N.-sanctioned peacekeeping force in Haiti.

Lower level U.S. officials have visited Brazil on many occasions, with much of the discussion relating to the Free Trade Area of the Americas (FTAA) since Brazil and the United States are co-chairs of the FTAA Trade Negotiation Committee with responsibility for guiding the talks in the final phase of negotiations. Brazil has been taking the position that the FTAA must include measures to curtail agricultural subsidies and to reduce the use of anti-dumping and countervailing duties to be acceptable, while the United States has argued that the broader agricultural issues should be resolved in the Doha round of WTO talks.

The WTO talks stalled in September 2003 in Cancun, Mexico, when Brazil led a group of developing countries called the G-20 that insisted that developed countries agree to reduce agricultural subsidies as part of any settlement. However, the talks were revived in early 2004, and a series of meetings led to agreement on August 1, 2004, on the framework of a possible agreement. This framework included commitments to make substantial reductions in trade-distorting domestic agricultural support programs, to phase-out all export subsidies under a yet-to-be-determined schedule, and to significantly improve market access for agricultural products.<sup>12</sup>

In the FTAA talks, Brazil and the United States took divergent positions in the November 2003 Eighth Ministerial Meeting in Miami, Florida. Brazil argued that if the United States insisted on deferring action on agricultural subsidies and anti-dumping measures to the Doha round of WTO negotiations, the agreement would be much less attractive for Brazil where agriculture has become the primary area for exports and development. In that case, Brazil argued that it would like to defer to the WTO negotiations a number of sensitive issues, including investment, services, government procurement, and intellectual property rights. In a mini-ministerial meeting in Washington, D.C. in early November 2003, Brazil and the United States agreed to a flexible formula for the FTAA, called by some an “FTAA light” or an “FTAA ala carte.” Under the formula, subsequently adopted by the Ministers, all of the countries would agree to a set of core obligations, while countries which favored a more ambitious agreement would negotiate plurilateral agreements. When the Trade Negotiations Committee (TNC) met in Puebla, Mexico, in early February 2004, the delegates were unable to agree on the FTAA common obligations, and the TNC was suspended. Despite four separate efforts in March, April, and May 2004, the cochairs have not been able to agree upon a framework for the FTAA negotiations, and most observers believe that it is unlikely that negotiations will be completed by the scheduled deadline of January 2005.

At the same time, negotiations for a free trade agreement between the European Union and Mercosur that were scheduled to conclude by the end of October 2004, broke down in mid-July 2004, with the EU demanding better access to Mercosur’s services sector, while Mercosur insisted on greater access to the European market for Mercosur agricultural products. Under these circumstances, the two sides called for a meeting of the lead negotiators by the end of the year and a ministerial meeting in the first quarter of 2005.

CRS Products:

CRS Report RL30121, Brazil under Cardoso: Politics, Economics, and Relations with the United States, by K. Larry Storrs.

CRS Report 98-987, Brazil’s Economic Reform and the Global Financial Crisis, by J. F. Hornbeck.

---

<sup>12</sup> For details, see CRS Report RS21905, The Agriculture Framework Agreement in the WTO Doha Round, by Charles E. Hanrahan.

Cuba

Cuba under Fidel Castro remains a hard-line communist state, with a poor record on human rights that has deteriorated significantly since 2003. With the cutoff of assistance from the former Soviet Union, Cuba experienced severe economic deterioration from 1989 to 1993. While there has been some improvement since 1994 as Cuba has implemented limited reforms, the economy remains in poor shape.

Since the early 1960s, U.S. policy toward Cuba has consisted largely of isolating the island nation through comprehensive economic sanctions. The Bush Administration has further tightened restrictions on travel and remittances to Cuba significantly. Another component of U.S. policy consists of support measures for the Cuban people, including private humanitarian donations and U.S.-sponsored radio and television broadcasting to Cuba, Radio and TV Marti. While there appears to be broad agreement on the overall objective of U.S. policy toward Cuba — to help bring democracy and respect for human rights to the island, there are several schools of thought on how to achieve that objective. Some advocate maximum pressure on the Cuban government until reforms are enacted, others argue for lifting some U.S. sanctions that they believe are hurting the Cuban people, and still others call for a swift normalization of U.S.-Cuban relations by lifting the U.S. embargo. There has been considerable reaction to the Bush Administration's June 2004 tightening of restrictions for family visits and other categories of travel.

Congress is continuing its high level of interest in Cuba with a variety of legislative initiatives regarding sanctions and human rights. Several FY2005 appropriations measures have provisions that would ease Cuba sanctions. The House-passed version of the FY2005 Commerce, Justice, and State appropriations bill, H.R. 4754, would prohibit funds to implement, administer, or enforce recent restrictions on gift parcels and on baggage for travelers. The House-passed version of the FY2005 Transportation/Treasury appropriations bill, H.R. 5025, has three Cuba provisions that would ease sanctions on family travel, travel for educational activities, and private commercial sales of agricultural and medical products. The Senate committee version of the FY2005 Transportation/ Treasury appropriations bill, S. 2806, has a provision that would prohibit funds from administering or enforcing restrictions on Cuba travel. The Senate committee version of the FY2005 Agriculture appropriation bill, S. 2803, would allow travel to Cuba under a "general license" when it is related to the commercial sale of agricultural and medical products. The Administration has threatened to veto both the Transportation/Treasury and Agriculture appropriations measures if they have provisions weakening Cuba sanctions.

In other action, the 108th Congress has demonstrated concern about the poor human rights situation by approving four resolutions: S.Res. 97, H.Res. 179, S.Res. 62, and S.Res. 328. Numerous other legislative initiatives have been introduced that would ease sanctions on Cuba: H.R. 187, H.R. 188, H.R. 1698, H.R. 2071, H.R. 3422, H.R. 4678, S. 403, S. 950, and S. 2449/H.R. 4457. Two initiatives, H.R. 3470 and H.R. 3670, would tighten sanctions. H.R. 2494/S. 2002 would repeal a provision in law that prohibits trademark registration or courts from considering trademark claims if the trademark was used in connection with confiscated assets in Cuba; in contrast, H.R. 4225/S. 2373 would apply a narrow fix to the law so that it conforms with a World Trade Organization ruling.

Since a 1995 U.S.-Cuban migration accord, the U.S. Coast Guard has interdicted thousands of Cubans at sea trying to enter the United States and returned them to Cuba, while those deemed at risk for persecution have been transferred to Guantanamo and then found asylum in a third country. Those Cubans who reach shore usually are allowed to apply for permanent resident status in one year pursuant to the Cuban Adjustment Act of 1966 (P.L. 89-732). This so-called “wet foot/dry foot” policy has been criticized by some as encouraging Cubans to risk their lives in order to make it to the United States and as encouraging alien smuggling. Others maintain that U.S. policy should welcome those migrants fleeing Communist Cuba whether or not they are able to make it to land.

CRS Products:

CRS Report RL31740, Cuba: Issues for the 108th Congress, by Mark P. Sullivan.

CRS Trade Briefing Book, Cuba Sanctions, by Mark P. Sullivan
[<http://www.congress.gov/brbk/html/eetra108.html>].

CRS Report RL31139, Cuba: U.S. Restrictions on Travel and Legislative Initiatives, by Mark P. Sullivan.

CRS Report RL32251, Cuba and the State Sponsors of Terrorism List, by Mark P. Sullivan.

CRS Report RS20468, Cuban Migration Policy and Issues, by Ruth Ellen Wasem.

CRS Issue Brief IB10061, Exempting Food and Agriculture Products from U.S. Economic Sanctions: Status and Implementation, by Remy Jurenas.

CRS Report RS21764, Restricting Trademark Rights of Cubans: WTO Decision and Congressional Response, by Margaret Mikyung Lee.

Dominican Republic

President Leonel Fernández of the Dominican Liberation Party (PLD), who served as president previously (1996-2000), took office on August 16, 2004. Fernández is charged with helping the Dominican Republic recover from a deep economic crisis that occurred primarily as the result of three major banking failures and bailouts in 2003. Since then, the country has faced high inflation, double-digit unemployment, currency depreciation, and chronic power shortages. President Fernández used his electoral mandate to push the PRD-dominated Congress to pass tax increases as part of a fiscal reform package necessary to restart a suspended $600 million IMF loan. The package has been controversial, however, as it contains a tax on high fructose corn syrup, a major U.S. product used in the production of soft drinks. If the tax is not repealed, it could jeopardize the Dominican Republic's inclusion in the U.S.- Dominican Republic - Central America Free Trade Agreement (DR-CAFTA).

CRS Products:

CRS Report RS21718, Dominican Republic: Political and Economic Conditions and U.S. Relations, by Clare Ribando.

CRS Report RS21868, U.S.-Dominican Republic Free-Trade Agreement, by Lenore Sek.

CRS Report RL32322, Central America and the Dominican Republic in the Context of the Free Trade Agreement (DR-CAFTA) with the United States, coordinated by K. Larry Storrs.

Ecuador

In January 2003, Lucio Gutierrez, a former army Colonel who was part of the junta that toppled the government of Jamil Mahuad in January 2000, became the country's sixth president in seven years. Upon assuming the presidency, Gutierrez abandoned his populist rhetoric and adopted economic reform and good governance policies in order to secure support from the United States and the International Monetary Fund (IMF). Despite rapid economic growth driven by high oil prices, President Gutierrez's power has been limited by legislative gridlock, protests organized by indigenous groups that at once formed part of his governing coalition, and allegations of corruption within his administration. Gutierrez's approval rating has fallen to just 15%, and his party, the Patriotic Society Party (PSP), won barely 5% of the vote in the regional and municipal elections held on October 17, 2004. Legislators in the Ecuadorian Congress claim that they are just seven votes shy of the 67 needed to start impeachment proceedings against the President. Gutierrez must seek new alliances with mid-size parties, including that of exiled President Abdalá Bucaram, in order to shore up support for his government.

Despite some recent disagreements, Ecuador continues to cooperate with the U.S. counter-narcotics program and has mobilized its military and police forces to help control spillover effects from the conflict in Colombia along its northern border. Ecuador and the United States possess a significant trade and investment relationship that has been enhanced since 1992 by the Andean Trade Preference Act. In mid-May 2004, the United States began negotiations with Ecuador, along with Colombia and Peru, for an Andean Free Trade Agreement. Ecuador was placed on the State Department's 2004 Tier 3 List of countries that had not adequately combated trafficking in persons, but avoided U.S. sanctions by making progress on that issue between June and September 2004.

CRS Products:

CRS Report RS21687, Ecuador: Political and Economic Situation and U.S. Relations, by Clare Ribando.

El Salvador

On March 21, 2004, businessmen Tony Saca of the conservative National Republican Alliance (ARENA) party soundly defeated his nearest rival, Shafick Handal, a former guerrilla and Communist Party member, of the Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front (FMLN) to win the Salvadoran presidential elections. Mr. Saca took office on June 1, 2004, alongside Ana Vilma de Escobar, who became the first Salvadoran woman to serve as vice president. The new administration is facing a divided legislature, in which the FMLN continues to hold 31 of 84 seats. President Saca scored a number of early legislative triumphs, such as the approval of the 2004 budget and tough legislation to combat gang violence. Although 60% of Salvadoran approve of his overall job performance, 73% disprove of his August decision to send a new contingent of 380 Salvadoran soldiers to Iraq. The United States anticipates working with President Saca to combat narco-trafficking, to resolve immigration issues, and to promote free trade, possibly through the proposed United States-Dominican Republic-Central America Free Trade Agreement (DR-CAFTA). Some analysts predict the FMLN, which recently withdrew its support from a multiparty commission called by President Saca to discuss issues of national importance, could launch a legislative fight against the 2005 budget and DR-CAFTA.

CRS Products:

CRS Report RS21655, El Salvador: Political and Economic Conditions and Relations with the United States, by Clare Ribando.

CRS Report RL32322, Central America and the Dominican Republic in the Context of the Free Trade Agreement (DR-CAFTA) with the United States, coordinated by K. Larry Storrs.

Guatemala

Since taking office on January 14, 2004, for a four-year term, President Oscar Berger has attacked corruption and enacted long-delayed military reforms. Since the 1980s, Guatemala has been consolidating its transition from a centuries-long tradition of mostly autocratic rule toward representative government. A democratic constitution was adopted in 1985, and a democratically-elected government was inaugurated in 1986. Democratic institutions remain fragile. A 36-year civil war ended in 1996 with the signing of the Peace Accords between the government and the left-wing guerrilla movement. The accords not only ended the civil conflict but also constituted a blueprint for profound political, economic, and social change to address the conflict's root causes. They outline a profound restructuring of state institutions, with the goal of ending government security forces' impunity from prosecution, and consolidating the rule of law; a major shift of government funding away from the military and into health, education, and other basic services to reach the rural and indigenous poor; and the full participation of the indigenous population in local and national decision making processes. Berger has promised to make fulfilling the Peace Accords a central theme of his administration.

Berger has pursued corruption charges against his predecessor, Alfonso Portillo, of the Guatemalan Republican Front (FRG), and other former FRG officials. His proposed economic reforms include new income tax rates and a temporary tax to fund programs related to the peace process. He says passing the free-trade agreement signed with the United States is a top priority and that he plans to stimulate the economy by encouraging private investment. The Financial Action Task Force, an international organization dedicated to enhancing international cooperation in combating money-laundering, removed Guatemala from its list of non-cooperative countries in July 2004.<sup>13</sup> Guatemala had been on the list of nine countries — the only one in the Americas — during the Portillo Administration.<sup>14</sup> The Task Force welcomed progress made by Guatemala in enacting and implementing anti-money laundering legislation.

The United States has prohibited International Military Education and Training (IMET) and Foreign Military Financing (FMF) to Guatemala since 1990 because of human rights concerns. The Berger Administration has lobbied Washington to ease the military aid prohibition, noting that within its first six months in office it had reduced the size of the military by half and developed proposals for other military reforms. The government says it needs funds to modernize the military and provide equipment for border protection and counternarcotics efforts. While applauding the reduction in forces, some human rights groups say that other reforms required by the Peace Accords, such as adopting a military doctrine limiting the military to external defense, have not yet been enacted. They also express concern about continued human rights abuses, impunity for such offenses, and corruption among current and former military officials.

Furthermore, the proposed U.N. Commission for the Investigation of Illegal Armed Groups and Clandestine Security Organizations (CICIACS) has still not been formed. CICIACS, which would investigate and prosecute clandestine groups, through which many military officers allegedly engage in human rights violations, drug trafficking, and organized crime, was approved by the Portillo Administration and has yet to be approved by the Guatemalan Congress.

Some human rights groups argue that the U.S. ban on military aid should not be lifted until these and other reforms are carried out, and others not until reparations are made to civilian victims of the armed conflict.<sup>15</sup> The Guatemalan Congress authorized reparations to former paramilitaries (PACs) on August 19, 2004, despite opposition from human rights groups and others saying the Congress should not bow to threats of violence from the PACs if the legislation were not passed.

---

<sup>13</sup> "FATF Tackles Terrorism Financing, Delists Guatemala," Financial Action Task Force, July 2, 2004.

<sup>14</sup> Financial Action Task Force on Money Laundering, Annual Review of Non-Cooperative Countries or Territories, June 20, 2003. Paris, France.

Regarding respect for human rights, Guatemala has made enormous strides, but significant problems remain. The armed conflict is definitively ended, the state policy of human rights abuses has been ended, and civilian control over military forces has increased. On the other hand, security forces reportedly continue to commit gross violations of human rights with impunity, and Guatemala must still overcome a deeply embedded legacy of racism and social inequality. The U.N., the OAS, and the United States have all expressed concern that human rights violations have increased over the past several years, and that the Guatemalan government has taken insufficient steps to curb them or to implement the Peace Accords. The UN Verification Mission in Guatemala is scheduled to close in December 2004, after verifying compliance with the Peace Accords for ten years. In September 2004, UN Secretary General Kofi Annan said that Guatemala's political process had matured to the point where the country should now be able to deal peacefully with all of its unresolved issues.

From 1997 through 2003, U.S. assistance to Guatemala focused on support of the peace process. U.S. aid to Guatemala no longer includes a project specifically in support of the peace process and has been cut by more than a third in the past three years, declining from about $60 million in FY2002 to $38 million requested for FY2005. Congress criticized the Administration's strategy of reducing staffing and funding for Guatemala for FY2004 in its conference report for the FY2004 omnibus appropriations bill (H.Rept. 108-401), saying it would "limit the ability of the United States to be responsive at this critical juncture in Guatemala's history." The Senate version of the foreign operations appropriations bill for FY2005 (H.R. 4818) would appropriate "not less than" $23 million for Development Assistance and Child Survival and Health Programs funds for Guatemala.

Both the Senate and House versions of the foreign operations appropriations bill for FY2005 (H.R. 4818) would continue to limit IMET for Guatemala to expanded-IMET, or training for civilians, military justice reform, and respect for human rights. FMF would continue to be prohibited. The Senate version would allow "not to exceed $2 million in prior year 'Military Assistance Program' funds" to be available to Guatemala for non-lethal defense items if the Secretary of State certifies that certain military reforms have been enacted. These would include: the limitation "both in doctrine and in practice" of military activities to those permitted by the 1996 Peace Accords and cooperation with civilian authorities in the investigation and prosecution of military personnel implicated in human rights violations and other criminal activities. The Guatemalan government would have to carry out other prerequisites for the release of military assistance funds, including: actively working with the UN to establish CICIACS; continuing to make the military budget process transparent for present and past expenditures; facilitating the prompt establishment of a UN High Commissioner for Human Rights office in Guatemala; and increasing efforts to combat narcotics trafficking and organized crime.

---

<sup>15</sup> "Vice President Eduardo Stein Meets with U.S. Officials this Week to Discuss Military Funding," Guatemala Human Rights Commission/USA, July 19, 2004. Also, "WOLA Opposes Renewing Military Assistance to Guatemala (sic), As Guatemalan Vice President Visits Washington," Washington Office on Latin America, July 19, 2004.

CRS Products:

CRS Report RL32124, Guatemala: Political Conditions, Elections, and Human Rights, by Maureen Taft-Morales.

CRS Report RL32322, Central America and the Dominican Republic in the Context of the Free Trade Agreement (DR-CAFTA) with the United States, coordinated by K. Larry Storrs.

Haiti

Long-term political conflict in Haiti escalated until armed rebellions around the country led to the departure of President Jean-Bertrand Aristide on February 29, 2004. An interim government, headed by Prime Minister Gerard LaTortue, has taken over, but ongoing violent protests by both sides continue. Security conditions are so tenuous that some observers are expressing concerns that a civil war will break out or that Haiti will become a “criminal state.” Aristide went into exile in South Africa on May 31, 2004. Some supporters maintain that he is still the democratically elected president and that the United States forced him from office, a charge the Bush Administration denies.

Former soldiers have demanded restoration of the Haitian army, which had a long history of human rights abuses and was disbanded by Aristide in 1995. They have seized control of towns, assumed security responsibilities alongside local police, or expelled police officers in various parts of the country. Supporters of Aristide, demanding his return to office, began violent protests on September 30, 2004, the anniversary of the coup that removed Aristide from office in 1991. These have left at least 55 dead, including police officers who were decapitated. The Bush Administration condemned the violent “systematic campaign to destabilize the interim government and disrupt the efforts of the international community to assist the Haitian people” it says is being carried out by pro-Aristide armed gangs.<sup>16</sup> Both sides are heavily armed. The Haitian National Police are understaffed and under-equipped to maintain order.

Halfway through its initial six-month authorization, the UN Stabilization Mission in Haiti has less than half the 8,000 troops and civilian police it was authorized to have, and is finding it difficult to carry out its mandate to establish law and order. Two UN peacekeepers have been wounded. In addition, the mission’s efforts have been diverted by the need to help protect and deliver emergency assistance following Haiti's natural disasters.

---

<sup>16</sup> U.S. Dept. of State, “Violence in Haiti,” statement by Richard Boucher, Spokesman, Oct. 12, 2004.

Congressional concerns relating to Haiti include support for strengthening the transition to democracy; the cost and effectiveness of U.S. assistance; protection of human rights and improvement of security conditions; combating narcotics trafficking; limiting illegal Haitian migration; and addressing humanitarian needs.

Beginning in 2000, in response to an unresolved elections dispute, the Clinton Administration redirected U.S. humanitarian assistance through non-governmental organizations, rather than through the Haitian government. The Bush Administration continued this policy throughout the Aristide administration. Aid began to decrease at the end of the Clinton Administration and continued to do so for the first two years of the Bush Administration. The Bush Administration launched an initiative in 2003 to prevent the transmission of the HIV/AIDS virus from mothers to children; Haiti was one of 14 countries included in the program. According to USAID, between four and six thousand Haitian children are born with the virus each year. The Administration is providing aid to the interim LaTortue government, and will reportedly consider requests from that government for weapons purchases, which would mean lifting the arms embargo against Haiti that has been in place since a military coup ousted Aristide in 1991.<sup>17</sup>

The FY2004 foreign aid appropriations legislation (P.L. 108-199, Division D) continues to allow Haiti to purchase defense articles and services for the Haitian Coast Guard, prohibits the use of funds to issue a visa to any alien involved in extrajudicial and political killings in Haiti, allocates $5 million to the OAS Special Mission in Haiti and $19 million in Refugee and Entrant Assistance funds to communities with large concentrations of Haitian (and Cuban) refugees of varying ages for healthcare and education. Before the current unrest, Haiti was going to receive an estimated $55 million in U.S. foreign aid in FY2004. Additional humanitarian and disaster assistance was made available following floods in February and hurricanes in fall 2004, which left thousands dead or homeless. More costs were incurred with the U.S. military forces in Haiti. The Bush Administration has requested an additional $120 million in assistance to Haiti, for a total of about $230 million for FY2004-FY2005. According to USAID, the aid will be distributed as follows: $22 million for job creation; $45 million for government infrastructure support; $26 million for improved security through improved administration of justice; $122 million for humanitarian aid, including health care, nutrition, and education; and $15 million for elections support.

The FY2005 foreign aid appropriations bill passed by the House (H.R. 4818, Kolbe) would provide $50 million in ESF for Haiti and continue to allow Haiti to purchase defense articles and services for its Coast Guard. The Senate version (S. 2812, McConnell) contains several provisions regarding Haiti, including earmarks of $90 million for child survival, environment, judicial reform, 2005 elections, and other programs. It would also require reports on a multi-year assistance strategy, a reforestation plan and the Haitian government's role in human rights trials, and authorize U.N. Population Fund monies for family planning, maternal, and reproductive health activities. The Senate bill also makes several findings regarding improving security in Haiti, concluding that "the failure to establish a secure and stable environment and to conduct credible and inclusive elections will likely result in Haiti's complete transition from a failed state to a criminal state." The Senate asked for a conference on September 23, 2004.

---

<sup>17</sup> "U.S. Will Sell Haiti Weapons: Arms Embargo Reportedly Lifted in Violence-Plagued Nation," Associated Press, Oct. 20, 2004.

In July, the Senate passed the Haiti Economic Recovery Opportunity Act of 2004 (S. 2261), which would give Haiti additional preferential trade treatment if it makes certain democratic and economic reforms.

On July 20, 2004, international donors pledged more than $1 billion over the next two years to help Haiti rebuild its infrastructure, strengthen institutions, and improve basic services. The interim government signed an agreement with the U.N. and the OAS on August 23 to hold presidential, parliamentary, and local elections in 2005. The U.N. established a trust fund for the elections, started with $9 million in U.S. funds, which they hope will reach $41 million. Members of former President Aristide's Fanmi Lavalas party have threatened to boycott the elections and claim to face political persecution by the interim government. Several were arrested in October; reportedly the charges have not been made public.

CRS Products:

CRS Report RL32294, Haiti: Developments and U.S. Policy Since 1991 and Current Congressional Concerns, by Maureen Taft-Morales.

CRS Web Page CA9005, Haiti: Legislation in the 108th Congress, by Andy Mendelson, available online at [<http://www.crs.gov/products/browse/officialsources/haitileg.shtml>].

CRS Report 93-931, Haiti: Background to the 1991 Overthrow of President Aristide, by Maureen Taft-Morales.

CRS Report 95-602, Haiti: Efforts to Restore President Aristide, 1991-1994, by Maureen Taft-Morales.

CRS Report RS21751, Humanitarian Crisis in Haiti: 2004, by Rhoda Margesson.

CRS Report RS21349, U.S. Immigration Policy on Haitian Migrants, by Ruth Ellen Wasem.

CRS Report RS21839, Haitian Textile Industry: Impact of Proposed Trade Assistance, by Bernard A. Gelb.

Honduras

Honduras faces enormous challenges in the areas of crime (especially youth gangs known as maras) and human rights and improving overall economic and living conditions in one of the hemisphere's poorest countries. Inaugurated to a four-year term in January 2002, current President Ricardo Maduro is the 6th elected president since the country's return to civilian rule. The United States has a close relationship with Honduras, characterized by significant foreign assistance, an important trade partnership, a military presence in the country, and cooperation on a range of transnational issues, including anti-narcotics efforts and more recently the fight against terrorism. Negotiations for a U.S.-Central America Free Trade Agreement (CAFTA) with five Central American countries concluded in December 2003, which was signed on May 28, 2004; subsequently a combined U.S.-Dominican Republic-Central America Free Trade Agreement (DR-CAFTA) was signed on August 5, 2004. The Bush Administration views DR-CAFTA as a means of solidifying democracy in Honduras and promoting safeguards for environmental protection and labor rights in the country; critics fear that a CAFTA without strong environmental and labor provisions would do nothing to spur reforms in the country.

CRS Products:

CRS Report RS21103, Honduras: Political and Economic Situation and U.S. Relations, by Mark P. Sullivan.

CRS Report RL32322, Central America and the Dominican Republic in the Context of the Free Trade Agreement (DR-CAFTA) with the United States, coordinated by K. Larry Storrs.

Mexico

Congressional interest in Mexico generally focuses on trade, migration, drug trafficking and human rights issues, but more attention to migration was expected in 2004 following President Bush's January 7, 2004 immigration proposal. The President called for an overhaul of the immigration system to permit the matching of willing foreign workers with willing U.S. employers when no Americans can be found to fill the jobs. Under his proposal, temporary legal status would be available to new foreign workers who have work offers in the United States and to undocumented workers already employed in the United States for a term of three years that could be renewed but would end at some point. President Fox welcomed the proposal when he met President Bush on several occasions in early 2004, and he called for renewed attention to immigration matters when he congratulated President Bush on his re-election on November 3, 2004. The proposal was in keeping with Fox-Bush pledges in 2001, subsequently stalled as a result of terrorism concerns, to work to achieve more orderly and humane migration flows between the countries. While the President's proposal had not been submitted in bill form by late October 2004, major comprehensive bills with guest worker provisions under consideration by Congress include: S. 1461 (McCain)/H.R. 2899 (Kolbe), S. 1387 (Cornyn), S. 2010 (Hagel and Daschle), and S. 2381 (Kennedy)/H.R. 4262 (Gutierrez). Other major initiatives include S. 1645 (Craig)/H.R. 3142 (Cannon), known as the AgJOBS bill, dealing with agricultural guest workers; and S. 1545 (Hatch), known as the Dream Act, that would permit states to provide in-state tuition to unauthorized alien students who are long-term residents of the United States.<sup>18</sup> In a related development, the separate House and Senate versions of S. 2845, passed in October 2004, to implement the 9/11 Commission recommendations, contain differing measures to increase immigration law enforcement personnel and to adopt more stringent border control and identity document standards.

On trade issues, Mexico is the United States' second most important trading partner, with two-way trade tripling since 1994 under the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA), but there are various disputes between the countries. Mexico has complained, for example, that the United States is still failing to grant Mexican trucks access to U.S. highways under the terms of the NAFTA pact, but access may be permitted shortly following the June 7, 2004 decision by the U.S. Supreme Court that an environmental impact statement is not required. The United States has complained about Mexico's 20% tax on soft drinks made with high fructose corn sweeteners (HFCS) that has had a devastating impact on HFCS and corn sales from the United States, and, on June 22, 2004, the United States formally requested the WTO to establish a dispute settlement panel to consider the U.S. claims against Mexico's HFCS tax. Mexico banned beef imports from the United States in December 2003 following the discovery of one cow infected with mad cow disease in Washington state. In March and April 2004, following the earlier announcement of new U.S. procedures that would exclude unhealthy cattle from the food chain, Mexico announced that it was resuming beef trade with the United States, but was retaining the ban on live cattle imports.

On drug trafficking issues, the State Department's March 2004 International Narcotics Control Strategy Report praised Mexico for the capture of major drug cartel figures, for the seizure of large quantities of illicit drugs, and for unprecedented levels of cooperation with the United States in counter-narcotics efforts. The State Department reported in April 2004, however that marijuana cultivation increased 70% and opium poppy cultivation increased 78% in Mexico in 2003, in part because of unusually favorable growing conditions. In recent law enforcement actions with U.S.-Mexico cooperation, Efrain Perez and Jorge Arellano Felix, two alleged lieutenants of the Arellano-Felix drug cartel, were arrested in Mexico on June 3, 2004, and Ramiro Hernandez, one of the alleged leaders of the Gulf cartel was arrested in Mexico on August 10, 2004. On October 19, 2004, DEA officials announced the dismantling through Operation Money Clip of a major Mexican money-laundering and drug trafficking organization.

On human rights issues, President Fox has freed several critics from jail, and he has designated special prosecutors to prosecute those responsible for human rights abuses in the 1970s and 1980s. Although a number of suspects have been arrested for past abuses, human rights groups argue that the special prosecutors have failed to produce significant results. In late January 2004, President Fox named a special prosecutor to coordinate the federal and state efforts to find and punish those responsible for a decade of slayings of over 300 women in Ciudad Juarez, across the border from El Paso, Texas. The State Department's March 2004 report on human rights conditions in Mexico notes that the government's efforts to improve the human rights situation appeared to stall, with a few exceptions. On July 24, 2004, a Mexican judge refused a special prosecutor's request for an arrest warrant against former President Luis Echeverria for involvement in a 1971 massacre, on grounds that the statute of limitations had expired.

---

<sup>18</sup> For details on immigration bills, see CRS Report RL32044, Immigration: Policy Considerations Related to Guest Worker Programs, by Andorra Bruno; and CRS Report RL31365, Unauthorized Alien Students: Issues and Legislation, by Andorra Bruno and Jeffrey J. Kuenzi.

CRS Products:

CRS Report RL31876, Mexico-U.S. Relations: Issues for the 108th Congress, by K. Larry Storrs.

CRS Report 98-174, Mexican Drug Certification Issues: U.S. Congressional Action, 1986-2002, by K. Larry Storrs.

CRS Report RL31412, Mexico's Counter-Narcotics Efforts under Fox, December 2000 to April 2002, by K. Larry Storrs.

CRS Report RS21561, Mexico's Congress and July 2003 Elections, by K. Larry Storrs.

CRS Report RL32044, Immigration: Policy Considerations Related to Guest Worker Programs, by Andorra Bruno.

CRS Report RL30852, Immigration of Agricultural Guest Workers: Policy, Trends and Legislative Issues, by Ruth Ellen Wasem and Geoffrey K. Collver.

CRS Electronic Briefing Book, Trade, "NAFTA," by J. F. Hornbeck.
[<http://www.congress.gov/brbk/html/ebtra42.html>].

Panama

Panama has made notable political and economic progress since the 1989 U.S. military intervention that ousted the military regime of General Manuel Antonio Noriega from power. Since then, the country has had four successive civilian governments, with the current administration of President Martin Torrijos of the Democratic Revolutionary Party (PRD) elected in May 2004 and inaugurated on September 1, 2004. In the May 2, 2004, election, Torrijos — the son of former populist leader General Omar Torrijos — won a decisive victory with 47.5% of the vote in a four-man race. His electoral alliance also won a majority of seats in the unicameral Legislative Assembly. Torrijos succeeded President Mireya Moscoso of the Arnulfista Party (PA) who been elected in May 1999. The most significant challenges facing the new government include dealing with the funding deficits of the country's social security fund (Caja de Seguro Social), developing plans for the expansion of the Panama Canal, and combating poverty and unemployment.

President Moscoso had been elected as a populist, with pledges to end government corruption and reduce poverty, but her campaign pledges proved difficult to fulfill amid high-profile corruption scandals and poor economic conditions over the past several years. As a result, the President's popularity fell considerably in her last year in office. In one of her last presidential acts, President Moscoso pardoned four anti-Castro activists who had been sentenced in April 2004 to prison terms ranging from seven to eight years for involvement in an alleged plot to kill Fidel Castro. One of the four, Luis Posada Carriles, was allegedly involved in the 1976 bombing of a Cuban airliner. Cuba responded to the pardon by breaking diplomatic relations with Panama. President Torrijos criticized the pardons and vowed to begin the process of reestablishing relations with Cuba.

Before the December 1989 U.S. intervention, the Panamanian economy had been severely damaged by two years of U.S. economic sanctions and economic disruption caused by the political crisis. Since 1990, the economy has rebounded, registering real growth annually, although the level of annual growth has varied a lot and slowed considerably in 2001 and 2002. Although the economy has improved considerably since 1990, poverty has worsened over the past three years because of slow economic growth. Income distribution remains highly skewed and high unemployment has been a persistent problem.

The United States has close relations with Panama, stemming in large part from the extensive history of linkages developed when the Panama Canal was under U.S. control and Panama hosted major U.S. military installations. The current U.S. relationship with Panama is characterized by extensive cooperation on counternarcotics efforts as well as U.S. assistance to help Panama assure the security of the Canal and the security of its border with Colombia. U.S. assistance to Panama has increased in the past several years with the country receiving assistance under the Bush Administration's Andean Regional Initiative to help Colombia and its neighbors combat drug trafficking.

U.S.-Panamanian negotiations for a bilateral free trade agreement began in late April 2004. To date, five negotiating rounds have been held, with the most recent concluding on October 22, 2004. Reportedly the most sensitive issues in the talks are differences over agriculture, with Panama wanting more access to the U.S. agricultural market, but fearing the full opening of its agricultural market to U.S. products.<sup>19</sup> Panama is seeking an FTA as a means of increasing U.S. investment in the country, while the Bush Administration has stressed that an FTA with Panama, in addition to enhancing trade, would further U.S. efforts to strengthen support for democracy and the rule of law. Since Panama has a service-based economy, it traditionally has imported much more than it exports to the United States. In 2003, the U.S. trade surplus with Panama was $1.5 billion, with Panama exporting $301 million in goods and importing $1.8 billion in merchandise. The stock of U.S. foreign investment in Panama was estimated at $20 billion in 2002, surpassing the combined U.S. foreign investment in the five other Central American nations.

---

<sup>19</sup> "Panama, United States Make Progress in Fifth Round of Trade Talks," Associated Press, October 22, 2004.

CRS Products:

CRS Report RL30981, Panama: Political and Economic Conditions and U.S. Relations, by Mark P. Sullivan.

CRS Report RL32540, The Proposed U.S.-Panama Free Trade Agreement, by J.F. Hornbeck.

Peru

Peru under President Alejandro Toledo has been characterized by two seemingly contradictory trends: high economic growth and extremely low popularity of the president. President Toledo has been widely criticized as having weak leadership skills, his image has been damaged by personal issues, and his administration tarnished by corruption charges. Toledo's public support has remained low for two years, and was at 11% in October 2004. Many Peruvians wonder whether he will be able to survive politically until the end of his term in 2006. Toledo denies allegations of corruption, and said he would open his bank accounts to public scrutiny. Although the scandals are limited in comparison to the widespread corruption of the earlier Fujimori administration, they have proved damaging to Toledo, who came to office as a reformer.

Toledo has presided over 35 consecutive months of economic growth, in contrast to four years of stagnation under his predecessors. Peru has been more stable economically than its neighbors. Under Toledo, Peru has exhibited one of the highest growth rates in Latin America, with an increased economic output of over 4% for 2003 and 2004. The public is impatient, however, for a rapid improvement in its standard of living: 54% of the population lives in poverty, and 43% are underemployed. Responding to nearly constant, widespread protests by teachers, farmers, and others for higher wages, Toledo has declared several states of emergency. Opposition in Congress — where no party holds a majority — has also limited the President's ability to push through economic reforms. In July 2004, Toledo was further weakened by his party's loss of the leadership of the unicameral Congress.

Peru is a major illicit drug-producing and transit country. According to the State Department's March 2004 international narcotics report, Peru made progress in the preceding year on many components of the U.S.-Peru counternarcotics program, including the reduction of coca cultivation by 15%, and the signing of an extradition treaty. The United States and Peru signed a five-year cooperative agreement for 2002-2007 that links alternative development to coca eradication more directly than past programs have. After thousands of coca growers protested against forced coca eradication, the government and growers signed an agreement calling for the "gradual and fixed" reduction of coca leaf cultivation and restricted forced eradication. Peru is the second largest beneficiary, after Colombia, of the Andean Counterdrug Initiative. For FY2004, Peru was allocated $66 million for interdiction, $50 million for alternative development, and $1.7 million in Foreign Military Financing (FMF).

For FY2005, the Administration requested $62 million for interdiction, $50 million for alternative development, and $1 million in FMF.

Support for democracy and human rights also is a U.S. concern in Peru. U.S. initiatives include the provision of $50 million over five years to support consolidating democratic reform, $3.5 million to support the Truth and Reconciliation Commission in investigating past human rights abuses, and the continued declassification and delivery of State Department documents requested by Peru's Congress to support its investigation into corruption and abuses under the Fujimori government. President Alberto Fujimori fled the country in the wake of scandals in 2000. Vladimiro Montesinos, Fujimori's spy chief who had ties to U.S. agencies, continues to face trials on dozens of charges ranging from influence peddling to directing a death squad.

The case of Lori Berenson, an American jailed in Peru is an ongoing issue in bilateral relations. Berenson's 1996 conviction by a secret military tribunal was overturned but she was convicted again by a civilian court on charges of collaboration with terrorists. The Inter-American Court of Human Rights agreed in September 2002 to consider her case. Hearings were held in May and June 2004, and the court is expected to make its decision by the year's end. The government of Peru has agreed to abide by the court's decision.

The $1.6 billion Camisea natural gas project in Peru, supported by U.S. investors, has generated controversy. Critics, including some Members of Congress, some U.S. officials, and international environmental groups, expressed concern about its negative impact on indigenous societies and the environment, including a pristine tropical rain forest and Peru's only marine sanctuary for endangered birds and mammals. Supporters of the project say it will contribute greatly to Peru's economy, including some $5.5 billion in tax revenues, and $100 million annually to affected communities, and will reduce pollution in Lima. Two Texas energy companies are involved in the project: Hunt Oil Company, and the Kellogg Brown and Root unit of Halliburton Company. In August 2003, the U.S. Export-Import Bank board rejected a request for about $214 million in loan guarantees for the project based on concerns for the environment and indigenous people in the Amazon. The Inter-American Development Bank (IDB) approved $135 million in loans to the project in September; the United States abstained. According to the U.S. Agency for International Development, U.S. environmental laws required the Treasury Department to vote no on the loans because the required environmental studies had not been completed. In August 2004, gas from Camisea reached Lima.

CRS Products:

CRS Report RS20536, Peruvian Elections in 2000: Congressional Concerns and Policy Approaches, by Maureen Taft-Morales.

CRS Report RL32337, Andean Counterdrug Initiative (ACI) and Related Funding Programs: FY2005 Assistance, by Connie Veillette.

Venezuela

An oil-exporting South American nation with a population of about 25 million, Venezuela has been wracked by several years of political turmoil under the rule of President Hugo Chavez, who was first elected in 1998. Under Chavez, Venezuela has undergone enormous political changes, with a new constitution in place, a new unicameral legislature, and even a new name for the country, the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela. Chavez was re-elected President with a new six-year term in July 2000 under the new constitution. Although President Chavez remained widely popular until mid-2001, his popularity has eroded considerably after that amid concerns that he was imposing a leftist agenda on the country and that his government was ineffective in improving living conditions. In April 2002, massive opposition protests and pressure by the military led to the ouster of Chavez from power for a brief period. However, the military ultimately restored him to power. Political opposition to Chavez's rule has continued since his return to office. From early December 2002 until early February 2003, the opposition orchestrated a general strike that severely curtailed Venezuela's oil exports and disrupted the economy but was unsuccessful in getting President Chavez to agree to an early non-binding referendum on his rule or new elections.

After months of negotiations facilitated by the Organization of American States (OAS) and the Carter Center, the government of Hugo Chavez and the political opposition signed an agreement in May 2003 that set forth mechanisms to resolve the political crisis. This included holding a presidential recall referendum pursuant to constitutional provisions, which ultimately was held on August 15, 2004. Leading up to the referendum, public opinion polls conducted by various survey firms yielded significantly different results, with some favoring the opposition and some favoring Chavez, but by early August 2004 a number of polls showed Chavez with an advantage. In the end, Chavez convincingly won the overall vote by a margin of 59.3% to 40.7%. The opposition claimed fraud and refused to accept the outcome, but both the OAS and Carter Center concluded that the vote results were accurate and conducted an additional audit of the vote to confirm the results.

The United States has traditionally had close relations with Venezuela, but there has been friction in relations with the Chavez government. The Bush Administration expressed strong support for the work of the OAS in resolving the crisis, welcomed the May 2003 political accord, and supported its implementation. After the recall referendum, the Administration congratulated the Venezuelan people for their commitment to democracy and commended the work of the OAS and Carter Center. At the same time, U.S. officials stressed the importance of reconciliation on the part of the government and the opposition in order to resolve their political differences peacefully. A dilemma for U.S. policymakers has been how to press the Chavez government to adhere to democratic principles without taking sides in Venezuela's polarized political conflict. Since Venezuela is a major supplier of foreign oil to the United States (the fourth major foreign supplier in 2003, after Saudi Arabia, Canada, and Mexico), a key U.S. interest has been ensuring the continued flow of oil exports at a reasonable and stable price.

CRS Products:

CRS Report RL32488, Venezuela: Political Conditions and U.S. Policy, by Mark P. Sullivan.