

Sources of Legislative Proposals: A Descriptive Introduction

Judy Schneider
Specialist on the Congress

April 17, 2008

Congressional Research Service

7-5700

www.crs.gov

RS21169

Summary

Ideas for legislation come from individual Members of Congress, congressional committees and subcommittees, informal groups of Members, the executive and judicial branches, state and local governments, foreign governments, constituents, advocacy and lobby groups, and the press.

Contents

Individual Members .....	1
Committee and Subcommittees .....	1
Informal Groups.....	1
Executive Branch.....	1
State and Local Government.....	1
Supreme Court.....	2
Foreign Governments.....	2
Constituents .....	2
Advocacy and Lobby Groups .....	2
Press.....	2

Contacts

Author Contact Information .....	3
----------------------------------	---

Individual Members

When Members are elected to Congress, they usually come to Washington to legislate on promises made during their campaign. They have ideas on what their district or state needs and what is best for the nation. Their ideas are frequently transformed into legislation that appears among the thousands of measures that are introduced in the first weeks of a new Congress and throughout the two years. Legislation can also be included in so-called omnibus measures. Members also initiate legislation following extended visits to their constituents after seeing and assessing needs firsthand.

Committee and Subcommittees

Committees and subcommittees charged by House or Senate rules with legislating, studying and reviewing, and investigating specific policy areas make their own legislative proposals. House and Senate committees identify needs for legislation and are crucial in recommending that such legislation be introduced. By the time of the bill's introduction, the appropriate committee is well prepared to continue its work.

Informal Groups

In addition to the numerous committees and subcommittees, there is a myriad of informal groups of Members with interests in a particular issue or region of the country. These groups study issues and lobby for the enactment of specific policies. For example, the Congressional Black Caucus and the Congressional Caucus for Women's Issues are active in promoting causes and initiating legislation. Recent freshman classes have also been recognized as cohesive in their policy pursuits.

Executive Branch

The Constitution of the United States grants to the President the power to propose legislation. At the beginning of each year, in a televised State of the Union Message, the President addresses Congress and the nation in the House of Representatives' chamber to announce his legislative priorities for that year. Throughout the year, through executive messages and policy speeches, among other ways, the President converts the broad concepts from his speech into specific legislative ideas for congressional consideration. Many proposals grow out of campaign issues and reflect the policy initiatives that may have led to the President's election. Many others reflect the recommendations of his Cabinet and other executive branch policy advisers as they determine new authority or reforms needed related to existing laws.

State and Local Government

Although autonomous from the national legislature, state and local governments often look to Congress for assistance in solving local problems. This aid is often monetary, but occasionally it may take the form of federal regulations affecting local activities. For example, in the case of the Safe Drinking Water Act, the needs of the locality are met through legislation providing funds, but also requiring that certain national standards be met. National legislators attempt to design such legislation in a fashion that favors conditions in their state or district.

Supreme Court

Constitutionality, the highest court in the nation interprets the laws Congress passes. Legislation ruled unconstitutional by the court, or policy decisions or directives made by the Court in its rulings, often find their way back to Congress's agenda in the form of new legislative proposals.

Foreign Governments

Congress serves a foreign as well as a domestic policy function. The Senate is constitutionally charged with advice and consent on appointment of ambassadors and ratification of treaties with foreign governments. The needs of individual countries and global regions are addressed in Congress as legislative proposals.

Constituents

Members of Congress serve legislative and representative functions. As representatives, they seek to address the needs of their constituents through the legislative process. Constituents' ideas often find their way into legislation. Pictures of average citizens, and in some cases, famous actors and actresses, rather than lobbyists and politicians, testifying about specific legislative needs, or the piles of mail from home being delivered to Members offices are commonplace. Because reelection is so closely tied to taking care of constituents, many of their demands are translated into legislation, especially when they affect many individuals and more than one district or state.

Advocacy and Lobby Groups

It is generally believed among Congress watchers that there exists an interest group for almost every issue before the Congress. Many of these groups seek to influence decision making once legislation is introduced; others seek to influence the legislative agenda itself, including which measures should be considered and which should be kept off the agenda. In addition to providing legislative proposals, these groups actively seek action on them.

Press

An internal joke on Capitol Hill says that the day after the television show 60 Minutes is on, or the day after the magazine Readers Digest hits the newsstands, are the worst days to work in a congressional office, especially as a caseworker or press secretary. These two outside sources are believed on Capitol Hill to provoke more ideas for more legislation for more Members than all other sources combined. The press is a potent watchdog for Congress and an equally potent advocate for the citizenry. Ideas raised in the media, especially local media, elicit serious consideration by Members.

Author Contact Information

-name redacted-
Specialist on the Congress
-redacted-@crs.loc.gov, 7-....

EveryCRSReport.com

The Congressional Research Service (CRS) is a federal legislative branch agency, housed inside the Library of Congress, charged with providing the United States Congress non-partisan advice on issues that may come before Congress.

EveryCRSReport.com republishes CRS reports that are available to all Congressional staff. The reports are not classified, and Members of Congress routinely make individual reports available to the public.

Prior to our republication, we redacted names, phone numbers and email addresses of analysts who produced the reports. We also added this page to the report. We have not intentionally made any other changes to any report published on EveryCRSReport.com.

CRS reports, as a work of the United States government, are not subject to copyright protection in the United States. Any CRS report may be reproduced and distributed in its entirety without permission from CRS. However, as a CRS report may include copyrighted images or material from a third party, you may need to obtain permission of the copyright holder if you wish to copy or otherwise use copyrighted material.

Information in a CRS report should not be relied upon for purposes other than public understanding of information that has been provided by CRS to members of Congress in connection with CRS' institutional role.

EveryCRSReport.com is not a government website and is not affiliated with CRS. We do not claim copyright on any CRS report we have republished.