

Pakistan-U.S. Relations

K. Alan Kronstadt
Specialist in South Asian Affairs

November 10, 2008

Congressional Research Service

7-5700

www.crs.gov

RL33498

Summary

A stable, democratic, prosperous Pakistan is considered vital to U.S. interests. U.S. concerns regarding Pakistan include regional and global terrorism; Afghan stability; democratization and human rights protection; the ongoing Kashmir problem and Pakistan-India tensions; and economic development. A U.S.-Pakistan relationship marked by periods of both cooperation and discord was transformed by the September 2001 terrorist attacks on the United States and the ensuing enlistment of Pakistan as a key ally in U.S.-led counterterrorism efforts. Top U.S. officials have praised Pakistan for its ongoing cooperation, although long-held doubts exist about Islamabad's commitment to some core U.S. interests. Pakistan is identified as a base for terrorist groups and their supporters operating in Kashmir, India, and Afghanistan. Pakistan's army has conducted unprecedented and largely ineffectual counterterrorism operations in the country's western tribal areas, where Al Qaeda operatives and pro-Taliban militants are said to enjoy "safe haven." U.S. officials increasingly are concerned that the cross-border infiltration of Islamist militants from Pakistan into Afghanistan is a key obstacle to defeating the Taliban insurgency.

The United States strongly encourages maintenance of a bilateral cease-fire and continued, substantive dialogue between Pakistan and neighboring India, which have fought three wars since 1947. A perceived Pakistan-India nuclear arms race has been the focus of U.S. nonproliferation efforts in South Asia. Attention to this issue intensified following nuclear tests by both countries in 1998. The United States has been troubled by evidence of transfers of Pakistani nuclear technologies and materials to third parties, including North Korea, Iran, and Libya. Such evidence became stark in 2004, and related illicit smuggling networks may still be operative.

Pakistan's macroeconomic indicators turned positive after 2001, with some meaningful poverty reduction seen in this still poor country. However, economic conditions deteriorated sharply in 2008. President Bush seeks to expand U.S.-Pakistan trade and investment relations. Democracy has fared poorly in Pakistan, with the country enduring direct military rule for more than half of its existence. In 1999, the elected government was ousted in a coup led by Army Chief General Pervez Musharraf, who later assumed the title of president. Musharraf retained the position as army chief until his November 2007 retirement. Late 2007 instability included Musharraf's six-week-long imposition of emergency rule and the assassination of former Prime Minister and leading opposition figure Benazir Bhutto. However, February 2008 parliamentary elections were relatively credible and seated a coalition led by Bhutto's widower, Asif Zardari, and opposed to Musharraf's continued rule. The coalition's August vow to launch impeachment proceedings spurred Musharraf to resign the presidency and exit Pakistan's political stage. Zardari subsequently was elected as the new President. The Bush Administration has determined that a democratically elected government is restored in Islamabad, thus permanently removing coup-related aid sanctions. Pakistan is among the world's leading recipients of U.S. aid, obtaining more than $5.3 billion in overt assistance since 2001, including about $3.1 billion in development and humanitarian aid. Pakistan also has received about $6.7 billion in military reimbursements for its support of U.S.-led counterterrorism efforts. This report is updated regularly.

Contents

Introduction	1
Key Current Issues	3
Deteriorating Economic Circumstances.....	3
Increasing Islamist Militancy	4
Multiple Armed Islamist Uprisings.....	5
Al Qaeda in Pakistan.....	7
Conflict in Western Pakistan and the Afghan Insurgency	8
Questions About Pakistan’s Main Intelligence Agency	13
Pakistan’s New Dialogue With Tribal Elements	14
U.S.-Pakistan Counterterrorism Cooperation.....	18
Cross-Border Coordination and U.S. Military Action	20
Aerial Drone Attacks.....	22
Pakistan-India Relations.....	24
Selected Commentary on Future U.S. Policy Options	25
Other Notable Recent Developments.....	26
Setting and Regional Relations	28
Historical Setting.....	28
Political Setting	29
Musharraf’s 1999 Coup d’Etat.....	30
The 2008 Democratic Revival	30
Regional Relations	39
Pakistan-India Rivalry	39
The “IPI” Pipeline Project	41
Afghanistan	42
China.....	44
Pakistan-U.S. Relations and Key Country Issues.....	45
Terrorism	45
Al Qaeda’s Resurgence in Pakistan	48
Infiltration Into Afghanistan	48
Infiltration into Kashmir and India	51
Domestic Terrorism.....	52
Other Security Issues.....	53
Pakistan-U.S. Security Cooperation.....	53
Nuclear Weapons and Missile Proliferation.....	57
U.S. Nonproliferation Policy	61
Pakistan-India Tensions and the Kashmir Issue.....	62
Baluchistan Unrest.....	64
Narcotics	65
Islamization, Anti-American Sentiment, and Madrassas	66
Democratization and Human Rights	70
Democracy and Governance	70
Human Rights Problems	73
Economic Issues.....	76
Overview.....	76
Trade and Investment.....	79
U.S. Aid and Congressional Action.....	80

U.S. Assistance	80
Possible Adjustments to U.S. Assistance Programs	84
Coup-Related Legislation	86
Proliferation-Related Legislation.....	86
9/11 Commission Recommendations.....	87
Selected Pakistan-Related Legislation in the 110 th Congress.....	87

Figures

Figure 1. Map of Pakistan	92
Figure 2. District Map of Pakistan’s North West Frontier Province and Federally Administered Tribal Areas	93

Tables

Table 1. Overt U.S. Aid and Military Reimbursements to Pakistan, FY2002-FY2009.....	90
---	----

Contacts

Author Contact Information	93
----------------------------------	----

Introduction

A stable, democratic, prosperous Pakistan actively working to counter Islamist militancy is considered vital to U.S. interests. Current top-tier U.S. concerns regarding Pakistan include regional and global terrorism; Afghan stability; domestic political stability and democratization; nuclear weapons proliferation and security; human rights protection; and economic development. Pakistan remains a vital U.S. ally in U.S.-led anti-terrorism efforts. Yet the outcomes of U.S. policies toward Pakistan since 9/11, while not devoid of meaningful successes, have seen a failure to neutralize anti-Western militants and reduce religious extremism in that country, and a failure to contribute sufficiently to the stabilization of neighboring Afghanistan. In the assessment of a former senior U.S. government official, “Pakistan is the most dangerous country in the world today. All of the nightmares of the twenty-first century come together in Pakistan: nuclear proliferation, drug smuggling, military dictatorship, and above all, international terrorism.”¹ Terrorist bombings and other militant attacks have become a near-daily scourge in 2008 (see “Other Notable Recent Developments” section below).

Pakistan suffered a series of destabilizing developments in 2007, including a months-long political crisis and a November emergency proclamation which severely undermined the status of the military-dominated government of then-President and Army Chief Gen. Pervez Musharraf; a surge in domestic Islamist militancy following the July denouement of a standoff involving Islamabad’s Red Mosque complex; and the December assassination of former Prime Minister and leading opposition figure Benazir Bhutto, who had returned to Pakistan from self-imposed exile only months earlier. These developments led many Washington-based critics to more forcefully question the Bush Administration’s largely uncritical support for President Musharraf as a key U.S. ally. Following February 2008 parliamentary elections that seated a coalition of former opposition parties vehemently opposed to Musharraf’s continued rule, the U.S. government became more measured

Pakistan in Brief

Population: 168 million; growth rate: 1.8% (2008 est.)

Area: 803,940 sq. km. (slightly less than twice the size of California)

Capital: Islamabad

Heads of Government: President Asif Ali Zardari and Prime Minister Yousaf Raza Gillani (both of the Pakistan People’s Party)

Ethnic Groups: Punjabi, Sindhi, Pashtun, Baloch, Muhajir (immigrants from India at the time of partition and their descendants)

Languages: Punjabi 58%, Sindhi 12%, Pashtu 8%, Urdu (official) 8%; English widely used

Religions: Muslim 96% (Sunni 81%, Shia 15%), Christian, Hindu, and other 4%

Life Expectancy at Birth: female 65 years; male 63 years (2008 est.)

Literacy: 50% (female 36%; male 63% 2005 est.)

Gross Domestic Product (at PPP): $410 billion; per capita: $2,265; growth rate 6.4% (2007)

Currency: Rupee (100 = $1.25)

Inflation: 25.3% (August 2008)

Defense Budget: $4.53 billion (3.1% of GDP; 2007)

U.S. Trade: exports to U.S. $3.6 billion; imports from U.S. $2 billion (2007)

Sources: CIA, The World Factbook; Departments of Commerce and State; Government of Pakistan; Economist Intelligence Unit; Global Insight; The Military Balance in its public posturing and, when Musharraf came under imminent threat of impeachment in August, the Bush Administration called his fate a matter of internal Pakistani politics. Abandoned by many political allies and perhaps even by his military successor, Musharraf made the decision to resign the presidency and exit Pakistan's political stage on August 18. Within one week of the resignation, Islamabad's ruling parliamentary coalition fractured.

¹ Bruce Riedel, “Pakistan and Terror: The Eye of the Storm,” Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, 618, 31, July 2008.

There are indications that anti-American sentiments are widespread in Pakistan, and that a significant segment of the populace has viewed years of U.S. support for President Musharraf and the Pakistani military as an impediment to, rather than facilitator of, the process of democratization there. Underlying the anti-American sentiment is a pervasive, but perhaps malleable perception that the United States is fighting a war against Islam.² The Bush Administration continued to proclaim its ongoing support for Musharraf even after his imposition of emergency rule and the later sweeping rejection of his parliamentary allies by Pakistani voters. However, in 2008, the Administration showed signs of a shift in its long-standing Pakistan policies, in particular on the issue of democratization. As articulated by Deputy Secretary of State John Negroponte in March:

The United States is committed to working with all of Pakistan's leaders on the full spectrum of bilateral issues, from fighting violent extremism to improving educational and economic opportunities.... The United States looks forward to engaging Pakistan's new government on how best to promote economic growth and reduce poverty. The United States will continue to help the Pakistani people build a secure, prosperous, and free society.³

Still, many Pakistanis are resentful of perceived U.S. interference and pressure. In the words of one senior Pakistani commentator and former army general,

In trying to impose its will against the wishes of Pakistani people, the Bush administration further heightens anti-American sentiment; discredits the war on terror; and makes it more difficult for the new civilian government to stabilize. Air strikes by U.S. forces in the tribal belt, threats of more to follow, and Washington's fierce opposition to peace agreements also lead to widespread resentment and instability.⁴

Many in Pakistan are hopeful that the incoming administration of President-Elect Barack Obama will be less overbearing in its dealings with Islamabad and will also do more to nurture Pakistan's nascent democratic institutions.⁵

In 2008, Islamabad's new civilian ruling dispensation has been welcomed by U.S. leaders. In July, President George W. Bush hosted Prime Minister Yousaf Raza Gillani at the White House, where the two leaders issued a joint statement reaffirming the U.S.-Pakistan "Strategic Partnership."⁶ In September, Benazir Bhutto's widower Asif Ali Zardari—a controversial figure long bedeviled by corruption charges who had taken the reins of her Pakistan People's Party

² Kenneth Ballen, "Bin Laden's Soft Support," Washington Monthly, May 2008.

³ See http://islamabad.usembassy.gov/pr_03272008.html.

⁴ Talat Masood, "Managing Pakistan-U.S. Relations" (op-ed), Hindu (Chennai), June 25, 2008.

⁵ "Pakistanis Hope U.S. Under Obama Will Be Less Bossy," Reuters, November 5, 2008.

⁶ See <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2008/07/20080728-5.html>. Gillani's visit was panned by many analysts, who saw the new Pakistani leader failing to impress audiences in both Washington and Islamabad, thus further straining already tense bilateral relations (see, for example, "Gilani's Poor Show in the US," Jane's Foreign Report, August 12, 2008).

(PPP) upon her demise—ascended to the Pakistani presidency with the congratulations of top U.S. officials. Later that month, Deputy Secretary Negroponte hosted Foreign Minister Shah Mehmood Qureshi in Washington for the third round of the Pakistan-U.S. Strategic Dialogue, where the two sides “reaffirmed their commitments to a wide-ranging, substantive, and long-term strategic partnership.”⁷

A “Friends of Pakistan” group was launched in September, when co-chairs President Zardari and the top diplomats of the United Arab Emirates, Britain, and the United States were joined by foreign ministers from Australia, Canada, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, and Turkey, and representatives of China, the European Union, and the United Nations. A resulting statement expressed agreement to work in strategic partnership with Pakistan to combat violent extremism; develop a comprehensive approach to economic and social development; coordinate an approach to stabilizing and developing border regions; address Pakistan’s energy shortfall; and support democratic institutions.⁸

Key Current Issues

Pakistan’s worsening economic conditions, fluid political setting, and perilous security circumstances make the job of U.S. decision makers difficult. On the economic front, the newly elected civilian government in Islamabad faces crises that erode their options and elicit growing public resentment. On the political front, an unprecedented ruling coalition including the country’s two leading mainstream parties proved fragile and collapsed almost immediately upon the resignation of President Musharraf, without having enacted any major policies. On the security front, Pakistan is the setting for multiple armed Islamist insurgencies, some of which span the border with Afghanistan and contribute to the destabilization of that country. Al Qaeda forces remain active on Pakistani territory.

On September 20, 2008, at least 53 people were killed and hundreds wounded when a suicide truck bomber attacked the American-owned Marriott hotel in Islamabad. Pakistani officials suspect Taliban militants based in western tribal areas of perpetrating the attack, which may have been targeting Pakistani political leaders who, by some accounts, were slated to be dining there later in the day.⁹ The attack—called “Pakistan’s 9/11” by some observers—spurred numerous commentaries arguing that the “war on terrorism” could no longer be perceived as an “American war” as it clearly requires Pakistanis to fight in their own self-defense.¹⁰

Deteriorating Economic Circumstances¹¹

Soaring inflation, along with serious food and energy shortages, has elicited considerable economic anxiety in Pakistan. Such concerns weigh heavily on the new government. In June, the Finance Ministry released its annual Economic Survey, which reported dismal economic ⁷ See <http://www.state.gov/r/pa/prs/ps/2008/sept/110444.htm>.

⁸ See <http://www.state.gov/r/pa/prs/ps/2008/sept/110353.htm>.

⁹ “Pakistan Leaders Were to Meet at Hotel, Official Says,” Wall Street Journal, September 23, 2008; “Marriott Says No Official Dinner Planned on Bombing Day,” Daily Times (Lahore), September 23, 2008.

¹⁰ See, for example, “Admit It: This is Pakistan’s War” (editorial), News (Karachi), September 22, 2008.

¹¹ See also CRS Report RS22983, Pakistan’s Capital Crisis: Implications for U.S. Policy.

performance, growing fiscal and current account deficits, rising external debt, dwindling foreign exchange reserves, and a depreciating currency. The country's consumer prices are at their highest level since 1975, with an inflation rate above 24%. The rupee's value is at record lows, down more than 20% against the U.S. dollar in 2008, and net international reserves have declined by more than half in only one year to less than $7 billion.¹² Two major international investor rating indices recently cut Pakistan's sovereign debt rating to "negative." Pakistan's central bank has sought to address rising inflation by boosting interest rates, leading in turn to a nearly 5% loss in the Karachi stock market's main index, which has lost nearly half its value since record April highs. Moreover, serious power shortages have led to nationwide outages, triggering protests that turned violent at times and further harmed the economy.¹³

A senior International Monetary Fund (IMF) official sees Pakistan requiring "substantial external financing" to stabilize its economy, and the World Bank is considering a $1.4 billion package to boost investment and to develop infrastructure. Most estimates have Pakistan urgently requiring at least $4 billion to avoid defaulting on its balance of payments. Islamabad first looked to intergovernmental organizations such as the World Bank and to traditional close state allies such as China and Saudi Arabia. Met with no clear assurances, it then shifted attention to the recently-created, informal "Friends of Pakistan" grouping of countries, which is set to meet in mid-November. Yet there are reasons for pessimism that this "Plan B" will generate the desired results.¹⁴ As a fallback position, Pakistani leaders have approached the IMF to discuss infusions of desperately sought capital, although these would come with stringent fiscal belt-tightening conditions that may damage the government's domestic political standing. Pakistan could need as much as $15 billion in international capital infusions over the next two years.¹⁵

Increasing Islamist Militancy

Islamist extremism and militancy has been a menace to Pakistani society throughout the post-2001 period, becoming especially prevalent in 2007 and 2008. According to the U.S. Director of National Intelligence, the loss of human life related to Islamist militancy was greater in 2007 than in the previous six years combined. The U.S. National Counterterrorism Center's most recent annual report found the incidence of terrorism in Pakistan in 2007 up by 137% over the previous year, with 1,335 terrorism-related fatalities placing the country third in the world on such a scale, after Iraq and Afghanistan. Only two suicide bombings were reported in Pakistan in all of 2002;

¹² See http://www.finance.gov.pk/finance_survery_chapter.aspx?id=18; "Rising Oil, Food Prices Hurting Pakistan's Poor," World Bank Press Release, May 30, 2008; "Pakistan's Consumer Prices Hit 33-Year High," Financial Times (London), June 11, 2008; IMF Press Briefing, July 24, 2008.

¹³ "Moody's Cuts Pakistan's Bond Outlook to Negative," Reuters, September 23, 2008; "Karachi Shares Fall on Rate Rise," BBC News, May 23, 2008; "Electricity Outages Anger, Frustrate Pakistanis," Associated Press, June 4, 2008. See also "Troubled Pakistan Economy Compounds Leaders' Woes," Wall Street Journal, September 19, 2008.

¹⁴ In October, the lead U.S. diplomat for the region told an Islamabad audience that the purpose of the Friends of Pakistan effort was not to "throw money on the table" or to provide "a cash advance," but rather to forward a "systematic process" in which foreign aid to Pakistan is optimally targeted (see <http://www.state.gov/p/sca/rls/rm/2008/111084.htm>).

¹⁵ "Pakistan Needs $10-15 Bln Fast, Says PM's Adviser," Reuters, October 21, 2008. Unconfirmed reports include major defense spending cuts among the list of conditions the IMF would place on Islamabad, but Pakistani leaders and IMF officials deny that such cuts are part of the IMF agenda ("Pakistan Fights Defense Spending Cuts," Jane's Defense Weekly, October 31, 2008).

that number grew to at least 57 in 2007. According to Pakistan's intelligence agency, Pakistan has now overtaken Iraq as site of the world's most suicide-bombing deaths.¹⁶

The myriad militant groups operating in Pakistan, many of which have in the past displayed mutual animosity, may be increasing their levels of coordination and planning. Moreover, a new generation of militants is comprised of battle-hardened jihadis with fewer allegiances to religious and tribal leaders and customs.¹⁷ One Western press report called Pakistan's Federally Administered Tribal Areas (FATA) "the most ungoverned, combustible region in the world," and an unrelenting surge in Islamist-related violence in Pakistan has some observers fearing a total collapse of the Pakistani state.¹⁸ Deputy Secretary of State Negroponte warned in late 2008 that, "The United States and our allies face near-term challenges from Pakistan's reluctance and inability to roll back terrorist sanctuaries in the tribal region."¹⁹

In 2008, the influence of Islamist militants appears to be growing unchecked in large parts of Pakistan beyond the FATA, bringing insecurity even to the North west Frontier Province (NWFP) capital of Peshawar, which reportedly is in danger of being overrun by pro-Taliban militants. Other so-called "settled areas" of Pakistan beyond the tribal regions have come under attack from pro-Taliban militants.²⁰ Indeed, the "Talibanization" of western Pakistan appears to be ongoing and may now threaten the territorial integrity of the Pakistani state.²¹ Top Islamabad government officials identify terrorism and extremism as Pakistan's most urgent problems. They vow that combatting terrorism, along with addressing poverty and unemployment, will be their top priority. Opinion surveys in Pakistan have found strong support for an Islamabad government emphasis on negotiated resolutions. They also show scant support for unilateral U.S. military action on Pakistani territory.²² As Islamist-related violence in Pakistan increases in intensity, Pakistani animosity toward U.S. policies appears to grow, as well.²³

Multiple Armed Islamist Uprisings

Pakistan is the site of numerous armed insurgencies of various scales that represent an increasingly severe threat to domestic and regional security. According to the U.S. intelligence community, "Radical elements in Pakistan have the potential to undermine the country's ¹⁶ DNI Statement before the House Committee on Intelligence, February 7, 2008; <http://wits.nctc.gov/reports/crot2007nctcannexfinal.pdf>; "Suicide Attacks a Growing Threat in Pakistan," Christian Science Monitor, October 10, 2008.

¹⁷ "Jihadist Groups Bond on Battle Over Afghanistan," Chicago Tribune, July 14, 2008; "Pakistani Militants Teaming Up, Officials Say," Washington Post, February 9, 2008.

¹⁸ "Like the Wild, Wild West, Plus Al Qaeda," Washington Post, March 30, 2008; "Analysts Fear Pakistan Could Fall to Extremists," Los Angeles Times, September 23, 2008; "The Long Road to Chaos in Pakistan," New York Times, September 28, 2008.

¹⁹ See <http://www.state.gov/s/d/2008/111320.htm>.

²⁰ "In Northwestern Pakistan, Where Militants Rule," Christian Science Monitor, February 28, 2008; "Taliban Bring Vigilante Law to Pakistan's Peshawar," Reuters, June 27, 2008; "Pakistan's Deal With the Devil," Salon, July 8, 2008; "In City of Tolerance, Shadow of the Taliban," New York Times, November 3, 2008.

²¹ Ziauddin Sardar, "Pakistan Must Cure Itself of the Taliban" (op-ed), New Statesman (London), July 24, 2008; "NWFP May Be Lost, Coalition Leaders Warn," News (Karachi), July 25, 2008.

²² See <http://www.terrorfreetomorrow.org/upimagestft/PakistanPollReportJune08.pdf> and <http://www.iri.org/mena/pakistan/2008-07-16-Pakistan.asp>.

²³ "Terrorist Attacks in Pakistan Stir Anger at U.S.," Christian Science Monitor, October 1, 2008.

cohesiveness.” A September 2008 report by leading U.S.-based experts on Pakistan said, “Militant groups freely meet, train, and raise funds throughout Pakistan.”²⁴

The Red Mosque

A July 2007 siege at Islamabad’s radical Red Mosque appears to have embittered Pakistani extremists and elicited acts of vengeance. The siege ended when Pakistani commandos stormed the complex and, following a day-long battle, defeated the well-armed Islamist radicals therein. Escalating steadily over the course of 2007, an open Islamist rebellion of sorts had been taking place in Pakistan’s relatively serene capital. Islamists at the Red Mosque and their followers in the attached women’s Jamia Hafsa seminary had battled security forces and threatened to launch a violent anti-government campaign unless Sharia (Islamic law) was instituted nationwide. In the period following the Red Mosque raid, religious militants perpetrated scores of suicide bomb attacks in Pakistan, most of them against security personnel. Moreover, upon reopening, the Red Mosque has continued to be a gathering place for strongly anti-Musharraf and anti-Western Islamist figures.²⁵

The Swat Valley

Pakistan has also since late 2007 faced a “neo-Taliban” insurgency in the scenic Swat Valley just 100 miles northwest of the capital, where radical Islamic cleric Maulana Fazlullah and up to 5,000 of his armed followers seek to impose Sharia law. Fazlullah, also known as “Maulana Radio” for his fiery (and unlicensed) FM broadcasts, moved to create a parallel government like that established by pro-Taliban militant Baitullah Mehsud in South Waziristan. Some 2,500 Frontier Corps soldiers were deployed to the Swat Valley, and the army soon took charge of the counterinsurgency effort at the request of the provincial governor, massing about 15,000 regular troops. By year’s-end, most militant elements in the area were reported to be in retreat, and the Pakistani government claimed victory.²⁶ Yet, in 2008, with militants still active in Swat, government officials apparently struck a peace deal. That deal appeared to have failed by mid-year, with sporadic and sometimes heavy fighting in Swat continuing to date.²⁷

²⁴ See http://www.dni.gov/testimonies/20080227_testimony.pdf and <http://www.cfr.org/content/publications/attachments/PakistanPolicyWorkingGroupReport.pdf>. One mid-2008 Pakistani newspaper editorial estimated that only 30% of the country or less was under the effective writ of the state, down from about half in the late 1990s. Another laments that “it is quite obvious that the militants call the shots” in much of western Pakistan. According to the Human Rights Commission of Pakistan, “Militancy is spreading and recruitment is in full swing.” The group cites what it calls credible reports that “militants are being handled with kid gloves while security forces are regularly using excessive force against noncombatants” (“Is There Peace Deal with the Terrorists or Not?” (editorial), Daily Times (Lahore), June 11, 2008; “Militant Menace” (editorial), News (Karachi), June 25, 2008; “HRCP Urges Holistic Approach to Combating Militants,” Press Release, June 3, 2008).

²⁵ “Pakistan’s Embattled Mosque Reopens With Fresh Momentum,” Washington Post, October 14, 2007; “1 Year Later, Pakistan’s Mosque Spirit Lives On,” Associated Press, July 2, 2008.

²⁶ “Pakistan Claims Win in Crucial NW Valley,” Washington Post, December 15, 2007; “Forces Launch New Offensive in Swat,” Dawn (Karachi), January 6, 2008; “Army Vows to Clear Swat of Militants,” News (Karachi), February 26, 2008.

²⁷ “Pakistan Clashes Take Heavy Toll,” BBC News, August 4, 2008; “Pakistan Army Kills Swat Rebels,” BBC News, August 23, 2008.

Pro-Taliban Militants in the Tribal Agencies

Fighting between government security forces and religious militants also flared anew in the FATA in 2008. Shortly after Bhutto's December 2007 assassination the Pakistan army undertook a major operation against militants in the South Waziristan agency assumed loyal to Baitullah Mehsud. Fierce fighting continued in that area throughout the year. According to one report, nearly half of the estimated 450,000 residents of the Mehsud territories were driven from their homes by the fighting and live in makeshift camps.²⁸ The NWFP governor has claimed Mehsud oversees an annual budget of up to $45 million devoted to perpetuating regional militancy. Most of this amount is thought to be raised through narcotics trafficking, although pro-Taliban militants also sustain themselves by demanding fees and taxes from profitable regional businesses such as marble quarries. The apparent impunity with which Mehsud is able to act has caused serious alarm in Washington, where officials worry that his power and influence are only growing.²⁹

The Tehrik-i-Taliban Pakistan (TTP) emerged as a coherent grouping in late 2007 under Baitullah Mehsud's leadership. This "Pakistani Taliban" is said to have representatives from each of Pakistan's seven tribal agencies, as well as from many of the "settled" districts abutting the FATA. There appears to be no reliable evidence that the TTP receives funding from external states. The group's principal aims are threefold: (1) to unite disparate pro-Taliban groups active in the FATA and NWFP; (2) to assist the Afghan Taliban in its conflict across the Durand Line; and (3) to establish a Taliban-style Islamic state in Pakistan and perhaps beyond. As an umbrella group, the TTP is home to tribes and sub-tribes, some with long-held mutual antagonism. It thus suffers from factionalism. Mehsud himself is believed to command some 5,000 militants. In August 2008, the Islamabad government formally banned the TTP due to its involvement in a series of suicide attacks in Pakistan. The move allowed for the freezing of all TTP bank accounts and other assets (though these are not known to exist in any official context) and for the interdiction of printed and visual propaganda materials.³⁰

Al Qaeda in Pakistan

U.S. officials remain concerned that Al Qaeda terrorists operate with impunity on Pakistani territory. Such concern surged following the July 2007 release of a National Intelligence Estimate on terrorist threats to the U.S. homeland, which concluded that Al Qaeda "has protected or regenerated key elements of its Homeland attack capability, including a safehaven in the FATA, operational lieutenants, and its top leadership." Numerous press reports indicate Al Qaeda has reestablished terrorist training camps in the border region. In December, Defense Secretary Robert Gates said, "Al Qaeda right now seems to have turned its face toward Pakistan and attacks on the Pakistani government and Pakistan people."³¹ In his February 2008 threat assessment for a ²⁸ "Pakistan Lifts Veil on Not-So-Secret Waziristan War," Reuters, May 20, 2008.

²⁹ "Mehsud Spending Up to 3bn on Militancy Annually: Ghani," Daily Times (Lahore), May 30, 2008; "Pakistan Marble Helps Taliban Stay in Business," New York Times, July 14, 2008; "Taliban Leader Flaunts Power Inside Pakistan," New York Times, June 2, 2008.

³⁰ "Tehrik-e-Taliban Pakistan (TTP)," Jane's World Insurgency and Terrorism, October 28, 2008; Hassan Abbas, "A Profile of the Tehrik-i-Taliban Pakistan," CTC Sentinel, January 2008; "Pakistan Government Bans Taliban," BBC News, August 25, 2008.

³¹ NIE at http://www.dni.gov/press_releases/20070717_release.pdf; "News Briefing with Secretary Gates and Gen. Cartwright From the Pentagon," December 21, 2007.

Senate committee, Director of National Intelligence McConnell offered the conclusions of the U.S. intelligence community:

Al Qaeda has been able to retain a safehaven in Pakistan's FATA that provides the organization many of the advantages it once derived from its base across the border in Afghanistan, albeit on a smaller and less secure scale. The FATA serves as a staging area for Al Qaeda's attacks in support of the Taliban in Afghanistan as well as a location for training new terrorist operatives, for attacks in Pakistan, the Middle East, Africa, Europe and the United States.³²

The number of Al Qaeda suspects estimated killed or captured in Pakistan—approximately 700—has remained essentially unchanged since 2004. Al Qaeda appears to be increasing its influence among the myriad Islamist militant groups operating along the Pakistan-Afghanistan border. Some Pakistani and Western security officials see Islamabad losing its war against religious militancy and Al Qaeda forces enjoying new areas in which to operate, due in part to the Pakistan army's poor counterinsurgency capabilities and to the central government's eroded legitimacy. At an April hearing on Al Qaeda, a panel of nongovernmental experts agreed that the ongoing hunt for Al Qaeda's top leaders was foundering.³³ In September 2008, Pakistan's top internal security official conceded that Al Qaeda operatives moved freely in his country.³⁴

Conflict in Western Pakistan and the Afghan Insurgency³⁵

An ongoing Taliban insurgency in Afghanistan and its connection to developments in Pakistan are matters of serious concern to U.S. policy makers. It is widely held that success in Afghanistan cannot come without the close engagement and cooperation of Pakistan, and that the key to stabilizing Afghanistan is to improve the longstanding animosity between Islamabad and Kabul.³⁶ Most analysts appear to agree that, so long as Taliban forces enjoy "sanctuary" in Pakistan, their Afghan insurgency will persist. U.S. leaders—both civilian and military—now call for a more comprehensive strategy for fighting the war in Afghanistan, one that will encompass Pakistan's tribal regions. The Chairman of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, Adm. Mike Mullen, sees the two countries as "inextricably linked in a common insurgency" and has directed that maps of the Afghan "battle space" be redrawn to include the tribal areas of western Pakistan.³⁷

According to the Pentagon, the existence of militant sanctuaries inside Pakistan's FATA represents "the greatest challenge to long-term security withing Afghanistan." The commander of NATO forces in Afghanistan asserts that Pakistan's western tribal regions provide the main pool for recruiting insurgents who fight in Afghanistan. Another senior U.S. military officer estimated ³² See http://www.dni.gov/testimonies/20080227_testimony.pdf.

³³ "Foreign Fighters of Harsher Bent Bolster Taliban," New York Times, October 30, 2007; "In Pakistan, Tentacles of Al Qaeda," Associated Press, October 26, 2008; Transcript: House Select Committee on Intelligence Holds Hearing on Al Qaeda, April 9, 2008.

³⁴ "Pakistan Admits Al Qaeda Moves Freely," McClatchy News, September 2, 2008.

³⁵ See also CRS Report RL30588, Afghanistan: Post-War Governance, Security, and U.S. Policy.

³⁶ See, for example, statements made at a January 23, 2008, House Armed Services Committee hearing on U.S. strategy and operations in Afghanistan.

³⁷ "Defense Chiefs Call for Wider War on Militants," Los Angeles Times, September 11, 2008; Adm. Mullen's statement before the House Armed Services Committee, September 10, 2008; "Obama to Explore New Approach in Afghanistan War," Washington Post, November 11, 2008. A brief primer on the cross-border aspects of the insurgency is at http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/south_asia/7601748.stm.

that militant infiltration from Pakistan now accounts for about one-third of the attacks on coalition troops in Afghanistan.³⁸ CIA Director Hayden said in March 2008 that the situation on the Pakistan-Afghanistan border “presents a clear and present danger to Afghanistan, to Pakistan, and to the West in general, and to the United States in particular.” He agreed with other top U.S. officials who believe that possible future terrorist attacks on the U.S. homeland likely would originate from that region.³⁹ Afghan officials continue to accuse Pakistani officials of aiding and abetting terrorism inside Afghanistan.

Pakistani officials have sought to allay Afghan leaders’ fears that truces in the tribal regions would lead to more cross-border attacks, assuring them that Islamabad makes no distinction between Pakistani and Afghan interests on this issue.⁴⁰ Yet Afghan President Karzai has asserted his country’s right to defend itself and “cross the border and destroy terrorist nests.” He has specifically named Baitullah Mehsud and Maulana Fazlullah among the anti-Afghan militants he wishes to see neutralized. Islamabad rejected the “regrettable” comments and vowed to defend its sovereign territory. When asked about the exchange, President Bush said, “Our strategy is to deny safe haven to extremists who would do harm to innocent people. And that’s the strategy of Afghanistan; it needs to be the strategy of Pakistan.” The U.S. President offered that improved dialogue between Islamabad and Kabul, revival of the cross-border jirga process, and better intelligence cooperation among all concerned countries could ameliorate the situation.⁴¹

Pakistan’s mixed record on battling Islamist extremism includes an ongoing apparent tolerance of Taliban elements operating from its territory.⁴² The “Kandahari clique” reportedly operates not from Pakistan’s tribal areas, but from populated areas in and around the Baluchistan provincial capital of Quetta. Many analysts believe that Pakistan’s intelligence services know the whereabouts of these Afghan Taliban leadership elements and likely even maintain active contacts with them at some level as part of a hedge strategy in the region. Reports continue to indicate that elements of Pakistan’s major intelligence agency and military forces aid the Taliban and other extremists forces as a matter of policy. Such support may even include providing training and fire support for Taliban offensives (see also “Questions About Pakistan’s Main Intelligence Agency” below).⁴³ Other reports indicate that U.S. military personnel are unable to count on the Pakistani military for battlefield support and do not trust Pakistan’s Frontier Corps, ³⁸ U.S. Department of Defense, “Report on Progress Toward Security and Stability in Afghanistan,” June 2008; NATO commander quoted in “Ragtag Taliban Show Tenacity in Afghanistan,” New York Times, August 4, 2008; “Gates is Pessimistic on Pakistani Support,” Washington Post, September 24, 2008.

³⁹ “CIA: Pakistan Border’s Clear and Present Danger,” Associated Press, March 30, 2008.

⁴⁰ See http://www.mofa.gov.pk/Press_Releases/2008/June/PR_156_08.htm. Some nongovernmental commentators in Pakistan openly insist that Pakistan’s domestic security is the primary goal and helping Afghanistan is a secondary objective, only (see, for example, Khalid Aziz, “Has Waziristan Stabilized?” (op-ed), News (Karachi), June 7, 2008).

⁴¹ “Karzai Threatens to Send Soldiers Into Pakistan,” New York Times, June 15, 2008; http://www.mofa.gov.pk/Press_Releases/2008/June/PR_176_08.htm; <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2008/06/20080616-1.html>.

⁴² “Right at the Edge,” New York Times, September 7, 2008; “Pakistan’s Dangerous Double Game,” Newsweek, September 15, 2008.

⁴³ See, for example, “U.S. Pays Pakistan to Fight Terror, But Patrols Ebb,” New York Times, May 20, 2007; “Killing Ourselves in Afghanistan,” Salon.com, March 10, 2008. One U.S. military officer claimed that Pakistani military forces flew multiple helicopter missions to resupply Taliban fighters inside Afghanistan’s Nangarhar province in 2007. The Islamabad government angrily denied the claims and a former top U.S. military commander in Afghanistan cast doubt on their veracity. In another example, an October 2008 press report claimed that British officials covered up evidence that a Taliban commander killed in Afghanistan in 2007 was in fact a Pakistani military officer (“Pakistani Forces Helped Taliban in 2007: U.S. Lt. Col.,” Defense News, September 22, 2008; “Taliban Leader Killed by SAS Was Pakistan Officer,” London Sunday Times, October 12, 2008).

whom some say are active facilitators of militant infiltration into Afghanistan. At least one senior U.S. Senator has questioned the wisdom of providing U.S. aid to a group that is ineffective, at best, and may even be providing support to “terrorists.”⁴⁴

As pressure on Islamabad to curtail the cross-border attacks has increased, Pakistani officials more openly contend that the problem is essentially internal to Afghanistan and has its roots in the inability of the Kabul government to effectively extend its writ, and in the lack of sufficient Afghan and Western military forces to defeat the Taliban insurgents. This view is supported by some independent analyses.⁴⁵ Pakistani leaders insist that Afghan stability is a vital Pakistani interest. They ask interested partners to enhance their own efforts to control the border region by undertaking an expansion of military deployments and checkpoints on the Afghan side of the border, by engaging more robust intelligence sharing, and by continuing to supply the counterinsurgency equipment requested by Pakistan. Islamabad touts the expected effectiveness of sophisticated technologies such as biometric scanners in reducing illicit cross-border movements, but analysts are pessimistic that such measures can meaningfully address militant infiltration, as such elements generally skirt border checkpoints, in any case.⁴⁶

Supply Routes

With roughly three-quarters of supplies for U.S. troops in Afghanistan moving either through or over Pakistan, Pentagon officials have studied alternative routes in case further instability in Pakistan disrupts supply lines. The Russian government agreed to allow non-lethal NATO supplies to Afghanistan to cross Russian territory, but declines to allow passage of troops as sought by NATO. Taliban efforts to interdict NATO supplies as they cross through Pakistan to Afghanistan have included a March 2008 attack that left 25 fuel trucks destroyed and a November 2008 raid when at least a dozen trucks carrying Humvees and other supplies were hijacked at the Khyber Pass. Despite an upsurge in reported interdiction incidents, U.S. officials say only about 1% of the cargo moving from the Karachi port into Afghanistan is being lost.⁴⁷ After a U.S. special forces raid in the FATA in early September, Pakistani officials apparently closed the crucial Torkham highway in response. The land route was opened less than one day later, but the episode illuminated how important Pakistan’s cooperation is to sustaining multilateral military efforts to the west. A Pentagon official subsequently said the U.S. military was increasing its tests of alternative supply routes.⁴⁸

Pakistani Military Operations

The Pakistan army has deployed upwards of 100,000 regular and paramilitary troops in western Pakistan in response to the surge in militancy there. Their militant foes appear to be employing ⁴⁴ “Border Complicates War in Afghanistan,” Washington Post, April 4, 2008; “Democrat Questions US Aid to Pakistan,” Associated Press, May 27, 2008.

⁴⁵ See, for example, “As ISAF Command Changes, Time for a Reality Check on the Conflict in Afghanistan and Pakistan,” Defense & Foreign Affairs Special Analysis, June 4, 2008; “American Failure in Afghanistan & Need for a New Social Contract in the FATA,” Center for Research and Security Studies, Islamabad, July 2008.

⁴⁶ See http://www.mofa.gov.pk/Press_Releases/2008/July/PR_208_08.htm; “Stopping Terrorists” (editorial), News (Karachi), June 10, 2008.

⁴⁷ “Taliban is Seizing, Destroying More NATO supplies,” Wall Street Journal, August 12, 2008; “Taliban Ambushes Threaten Nato’s Vital Logistics Route Into Afghanistan,” Sunday Telegraph (London), August 31, 2008.

⁴⁸ “Pentagon Seeks New Afghan Supply Routes,” Financial Times (London), September 23, 2008.

heavy weapons in more aggressive tactics, making frontal attacks on army outposts instead of the hit-and-run skirmishes of the past. The army also has suffered from a raft of suicide bomb attacks and the kidnaping of hundreds of its soldiers. Such setbacks damage the army's morale and caused some to question the organization's loyalties and capabilities.⁴⁹ Months-long battles with militants have concentrated on three fronts: the Swat valley, and the Bajaur and South Waziristan tribal agencies. Taliban forces may also have opened a new front in the Upper Dir valley of the NWFP, where one report says a new militant "headquarters" has been established.⁵⁰ Pakistan has sent major regular army units to replace Frontier Corps soldiers in some areas near the Afghan border and has deployed elite, U.S.-trained and equipped Special Services Group commandos to the tribal areas.⁵¹

In June, Pakistani paramilitary forces launched offensive operations against Islamist militants in the Khyber tribal agency near Peshawar, with more than 1,000 Frontier Corps troops attacking positions held by fighters loyal to Mangal Bagh. U.S. officials were encouraged by the more energetic Pakistani military action. The government reported major gains in pushing militants out of previous strongholds and, by early July, authorities were claiming to have reached a peace agreement with tribal elders.⁵² In mid-July, government forces launched another offensive, this time in the Hangu region of the NWFP. By month's end, a senior Islamist commander was reported killed in ongoing fighting and the still nominally obtaining truce was teetering on the brink of failure. Some observers called the government offensives a staged drama designed to placate both a nervous Pakistani public and a Washington audience that seeks more forceful action against religious militancy.⁵³

More recently, Pakistani ground troops have undertaken operations against militants in the Bajaur agency beginning in early August. The ongoing battle has been called especially important as a critical test of both the Pakistani military's capabilities and intentions with regard to combatting militancy, and it has been welcomed by Defense Secretary Gates as a reflection of the new Islamabad government's willingness to fight.⁵⁴ Some 8,000 Pakistani troops are being backed by helicopter gunships and ground attack jets. The Frontier Corps' top officer has estimated that militant forces in Bajaur number about 2,000, including foreigners. Battles include a series of engagements at the strategic tunnel Kohat tunnel, a key link in the U.S. military supply chain running from Karachi to Afghanistan.⁵⁵ The fighting apparently has attracted militants from neighboring regions and these reinforced insurgents have been able to put up surprisingly strong resistance, complete with sophisticated tactics, weapons, and communications systems, and reportedly make use of an elaborate network of tunnels in which they stockpile weapons and ammunition. Still, Pakistani military officials report having killed more than 1,500 militants in the Bajaur fighting to date. The army general leading the campaign believes that more than half of ⁴⁹ "Kidnapings and Suicide Attacks Shake Morale of Pakistan's Armed Force," Times of London, September 20, 2007.

⁵⁰ "Taliban Opens New Front in Pakistan," Daily Telegraph (London), September 19, 2008.

⁵¹ "Pakistan May Step Up Action Against Insurgents," Los Angeles Times, August 3, 2008.

⁵² "Troops Take Control in Pakistan's North," Washington Post, June 29, 2008; "Swat Taliban Reject Peace Negotiations," Daily Times (Lahore), June 30, 2008; "Pakistan Says Peace Deal Reached in Khyber Region," Associated Press, July 9, 2008.

⁵³ See, for example, "The Bara Operation is a Lie, Plain and Simple" (editorial), News (Karachi), July 1, 2008.

⁵⁴ "Battle of Bajaur: A Critical Test for Pakistan's Daunted Military," New York Times, September 23, 2008; "Pakistan's Fresh Resolve in Latest Battle Against Taliban," Christian Science Monitor, October 6, 2008; "Gates Lauds Pakistan Push in Tribal Areas," Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2008.

⁵⁵ "Stability in Bajaur Within Two Months," Daily Times (Lahore), September 27, 2008; "Pakistan and Taliban Battle for Key Tunnel," London Sunday Times, October 19, 2008.

the militancy being seen in Pakistan would end if his troops are able to win the battle of Bajaur.⁵⁶ Subsequent terrorist attacks in other parts of western Pakistan have been tentatively linked to the Bajaur fighting.

The Pakistani military effort in Bajaur has included airstrikes on residential areas occupied by suspected militants who may be using civilians as human shields. The use of fixed-wing aircraft continued and reportedly has killed some women and children along with scores of militants. The strife is causing a serious humanitarian crisis. In August, the U.S. government provided emergency assistance to displaced families. The United Nations estimates that hundreds of thousands of civilians have fled from Bajaur, with about 20,000 of these moving into Afghanistan. International human rights groups have called for international assistance to both Pakistani and Afghan civilians adversely affected by the fighting.⁵⁷

Tribal Militias

Autumn 2008 saw an increase in the number of lashkars—tribal militias—being formed in the FATA. These private armies may represent a growing popular resistance to Islamist militancy in the region, not unlike that seen in Iraq’s “Sunni Awakening.” A potential effort to bolster the capabilities of tribal leaders near the Afghan border would target that region’s Al Qaeda elements and be similar to U.S. efforts in Iraq’s Anbar province. Employing this tack in Pakistan presents new difficulties, however, including the fact that the Pakistani Taliban is not alien to the tribal regions but is, in fact, comprised of the tribals’ ethnolinguistic brethren.⁵⁸ Still, with as many as 20 suspected pro-government tribals being killed by Islamist extremists every week in western Pakistan, tribal leaders may be increasingly alienated by the violence and so more receptive to cooperation with the Pakistan military.⁵⁹ The army reportedly backs these militias and the NWFP governor expresses hope that they will turn the tide against Taliban insurgents. Islamabad reportedly plans to provide small arms to these anti-Taliban tribal militias, which are said to number some 14,000 men in Bajaur and another 11,000 more in neighboring Orakzai and Dir. No U.S. government funds will be involved.⁶⁰ Some reporting indicates that, to date, the lashkars have proven ineffective against better-armed and more motivated Taliban fighters. Intimidation tactics and the targeted killings of pro-government tribal leaders continue to take a toll, and Islamabad’s military and political support for the tribal efforts is said to be “episodic” and “unsustained.” Some analysts worry that, by employing lashkars to meet its goals in the FATA, the Islamabad government risks sparking an all-out war in the region.⁶¹

⁵⁶ “Pakistani Troops Destroy Taliban Stronghold,” Financial Times (London), September 30, 2008; “8,000 Pakistani Soldiers Take on Al Qaeda in Volatile Tribal Region,” London Times, September 27, 2008.

⁵⁷ “Pakistanis Displaced by Fighting in ‘Dire Need,’” Reuters, August 25, 2008; <http://islamabad.usembassy.gov/pr-08082003.html>; “Pakistanis Flee Into Afghanistan,” BBC News, September 29, 2008.

⁵⁸ “U.S. Hopes to Arm Pakistani Tribes Against Al Qaeda,” New York Times, November 19, 2007; Peter Brookes, “The Tribal Option” (op-ed), New York Post, November 20, 2007; “Will Iraq Playbook Work in Pakistan?,” Christian Science Monitor, January 15, 2008.

⁵⁹ “Taliban Rift With Pakistan Tribes May Help U.S., Official Says,” Bloomberg News, October 30, 2008.

⁶⁰ “Pakistani Tribesmen Organize to Fight Taliban Insurgents,” McClatchy News, September 27, 2008; “Pakistan Turns to Tribal Militias,” Wall Street Journal, September 30, 2008; “More Tribesmen Take Up Arms Against Taliban,” Daily Times (Lahore), October 7, 2008; “Pakistan Will Give Arms to Tribal Militias,” Washington Post, October 23, 2008.

⁶¹ “Pakistan Uses Tribal Militias in Taliban War,” New York Times, October 24, 2008; “Pakistan’s Risky Military Strategy,” BBC News, October 15, 2008. See also “As Taliban Overwhelm Police, Pakistanis Hit Back With Posses,” New York Times, November 2, 2008; “Pakistan’s Support of Militias Against Taliban Could Backfire,” Washington Times, November 10, 2008.

Questions About Pakistan's Main Intelligence Agency

The Inter-Services Intelligence Directorate (ISI) is Pakistan's main foreign intelligence agency. Close U.S. links with the ISI date back at least to the 1980s, when American and Pakistani intelligence officers oversaw cooperative efforts to train and supply Afghan "freedom fighters" who were battling the Soviet Army. Yet mutual mistrust has been ever-present and, in the summer of 2008, long-standing doubts about the activities and aims of the ISI compounded.⁶² Some analysts label the ISI a "rogue" agency driven by Islamist ideology that can and does act beyond the operational control of its nominal administrators. Yet many observers conclude that the ISI, while sometimes willing to "push the envelope" in pursuing Pakistan's perceived regional interests, is a disciplined organization that obeys the orders of its commanders in the Pakistani military.⁶³ In an episode that only brought embarrassment for Pakistan's newly seated civilian government, a July effort to bring the ISI under the formal control of the Interior Ministry was reversed only hours its announcement, fueling speculation that the Pakistani military does not intend to relinquish its traditionally primary role in foreign and national security policy making. U.S. officials reportedly continue to quietly criticize the new civilian government for its alleged "lack of supervision" of the ISI.⁶⁴

The Kabul government claims to have evidence of ISI complicity in both an April assassination attempt on Afghan President Karzai and in the July bombing of India's Kabul Embassy. The Indian government joined Kabul in issuing accusations of ISI involvement in the latter event. Islamabad counters that, despite repeated Pakistani demands, neither neighbor has provided any evidence supporting the "unsubstantiated allegations."⁶⁵ A June 2008 think-tank report on insurgency in Afghanistan included the finding that, "There is some indication that individuals within the Pakistan government—for example, within the Frontier Corps and the ISI—were involved in assisting insurgent groups" inside Afghanistan.⁶⁶

In July 2008, a top U.S. intelligence official reportedly presented evidence to Pakistani officials that ISI agents were providing assistance to militant elements who undertake attacks in Afghanistan. Specifically mentioned was an alleged relationship between ISI agents and members of the Haqqani network believed based in FATA and named as responsible the Kabul embassy bombing. U.S. counterterrorism officials reportedly do not believe that top Pakistani military or intelligence officials have sanctioned aid to the Haqqani network, but suspect that local and retired ISI operatives are complicit.⁶⁷ Islamabad angrily rejected such reports as "baseless and ⁶² "When Spies Don't Play Well with Their Allies," New York Times, July 20, 2008.

⁶³ See, for example, "The ISI and Terrorism: Beyond the Accusations," Council on Foreign Relations Backgrounder, July 9, 2008.

⁶⁴ "Spy Agency Confusion in Pakistan," BBC News, July 27, 2008; "Pakistan Puts Move to Rein in Spies on Ice," Reuters, August 5, 2008; "Pakistan's 'Rogue' Spy Agency Attacked," Financial Times (London), August 19, 2008.

⁶⁵ "Pakistan 'Behind Afghan Attacks,'" BBC News, July 14, 2008; "India Blames Pakistan in Embassy Bombing," Associated Press, July 21, 2008; http://www.mofa.gov.pk/Spokesperson/2008/Aug/Spokes_13_08_08.html.

⁶⁶ Seth Jones, "Counterinsurgency in Afghanistan," RAND Counterinsurgency Study 4, 2008, at <http://www.rand.org/pubs/monographs/MG595/index.html>, p. xiv. A spokesman for Pakistan's Inter-Services Public Relations rejected the report's findings as "misleading, factually incorrect, and based on propaganda," saying it was part of a "smear campaign" aimed at disrupting Pakistan's relations with its partners in fighting terrorism (<http://www.ispr.gov.pk/Archive&Press/CurrentMonth/10-Jun-2008.htm>).

⁶⁷ "C.I.A. Outlines Pakistan Links With Militants," New York Times, July 30, 2008; "Pakistanis Aided Attack in Kabul, U.S. Officials Say," New York Times, August 1, 2008; "Pakistan's Dangerous Double Game," Newsweek, September 22, 2008.

malicious,” but Pakistan’s federal information minister did concede that some individuals within ISI “probably” remain “ideologically sympathetic to the Taliban” and act out of synch with government policy.⁶⁸

President Bush himself was reported to have bluntly asked the visiting Pakistani Prime Minister who was controlling the ISI, and also to have expressed concern that Pakistani intelligence officers were leaking operational information to militants which could allow those elements to evade militarized efforts against them.⁶⁹ When asked about the ISI’s command structure, Prime Minister Gillani assured an American audience the agency “is under the Prime Minister” and “will do only what I want them to do.” The claim was met with scepticism and U.S. pressure on Islamabad to control the ISI persists.⁷⁰ Some observers see an increasingly frustrated Bush Administration’s “venting” of anger against the ISI as counterproductive and disrespectful of what they call a generally efficient and professional organization that has worked closely with U.S. government agencies.⁷¹

There may be apprehension in Pakistani military circles that President Zardari will seek to impose his will on the army by shuffling its leadership, a move that could bring direct confrontation with the country’s security establishment. At least some elements of Pakistan’s security services are said to find Zardari too compromising with the United States.⁷² On September 29, the Islamabad government named a new ISI chief, Lt. Gen. Ahmed Shuja Pasha, who had served as director general of military operations since 2005. Pasha, said to be close with Army Chief Gen. Kayani, is identified as a professional soldier who takes the threat of Islamist extremism seriously. Although little is known about the new intelligence chief, his appointment was met with cautious optimism by the Bush Administration.⁷³

Pakistan’s New Dialogue With Tribal Elements

In 2008, and for the first time in more than eight years, the United States is dealing with a political dispensation in Islamabad that has fundamentally differing views not on the need to combat religious extremism, but on the methods by which to do so. During their first months in office, Pakistan’s new civilian leaders called for renewed efforts at negotiating with the country’s Pashtun tribal leaders and Islamist militants, claiming a strategy reliant on military confrontation had backfired and allowed the militants to become stronger and more influential. Prime Minister Gillani insists that his government will not negotiate with “terrorists” nor with “anyone refusing to lay down arms.” As President, Asif Zardari has vowed to “root out terrorism and extremism wherever and whenever they rear their ugly heads.” He calls for bringing western tribal agencies into the political mainstream and proposes a three-pronged counterterrorism strategy that includes ⁶⁸ “Pakistan Denies ‘Malicious’ Report on CIA Confrontation,” Agence France Presse, July 30, 2008; “Pakistan Concedes Some ISI Spies Sympathetic to Taliban,” Los Angeles Times, August 2, 2008.

⁶⁹ “Bush Voices Concern Over ISI Role,” News (Karachi), July 31, 2008.

⁷⁰ “A Conversation With Yousaf Raza Gillani,” Council on Foreign Relations transcript, July 29, 2008; “U.S. Presses Pakistani Government to Place Its Spy Agency Under Civilian Control,” New York Times, August 2, 2008.

⁷¹ See, for example, Eric Margolis, “U.S. Vilifies Faithful Old Ally” (op-ed), Toronto Sun, August 3, 2008.

⁷² “Leader Emerging in Pakistan,” Wall Street Journal, September 2, 2008; “Zardari’s ISI Honeymoon,” Jane’s Intelligence Digest, October, 2008.

⁷³ “The Mystery Spymaster,” Newsweek, October 13, 2008; “Pakistan Picks New Chief for Intelligence Agency,” Washington Post, September 29, 2008.

making peace with elements willing to abjure militancy, investing in economic development, and using force only as a last resort against “those who challenge the writ of the state.”⁷⁴

Most Pakistani analysts appeared to welcome the new government’s policy of shifting away from President Musharraf’s militarized approach and hold some optimism that representatives of the people can succeed where past efforts have failed. Yet some commentators were less sanguine, warning that without assurances the militants will end attacks across the Durand Line, peace agreements will not serve Pakistan’s core interests and are bound to fail. One senior Pakistani commentator called a May truce deal in Swat “the most abject surrender of state sovereignty in Pakistani history.” This type of sentiment is echoed by some American editorialists, as well. Increasing militant attacks may have rendered the question moot. In a characteristic response to escalating violence, one English-language Pakistani daily opined in June that, “Peace had its chance, but the Taliban blew it” and “the state is left with no choice other than to crack down with all the resources at its disposal.”⁷⁵

The Pashtun nationalist Awami National Party (ANP), which oversees a new coalition government in the North West Frontier Province (NWFP), has played a central role in negotiations with tribal elders and militant groups. The ANP has urged the federal government to engage in direct negotiations with FATA militants through jirgas, and there have been indications that dialogue with the FATA’s Islamist elements was being conducted by the Pakistan army, itself, and predated the February elections. The military’s covert deal-making with extremist elements may have caused friction with Pakistan’s new civilian leadership. Moreover, ANP leaders, along with the opposition leading PML-N of Nawaz Sharif, come under particular criticism for their apparent inclination to “take the populist route of appeasement” in dealing with militancy.⁷⁶

Status of Negotiations

In April, the NWFP government reportedly struck an agreement with extremist leaders in which militants vowed to halt their propaganda efforts and cooperate with government agencies in the Malakand District bordering the FATA. Pakistani authorities reportedly inked a 15-point peace pact with pro-Taliban militants in the Swat Valley in May in which government forces would “gradually” withdraw from the region and Sharia law would be enforced. In return, militants loyal to Maulana Fazlullah agreed to end attacks, allow girls to attend school, and stop carrying weapons in public.⁷⁷ In June, a senior advisor to the Pakistani prime minister claimed the Swat deal had been scrapped due to militant intransigence and continued attacks on security forces there. The NWFP government subsequently denied that the peace deal had been dismantled, yet, ⁷⁴ Yousaf Raza Gillani, “Pakistan’s Moment” (op-ed), Washington Post, April 30, 2008; <http://www.pid.gov.pk/Final%20Speech%20of%20President.doc>.

⁷⁵ “Truce With Taliban Won’t Last” (editorial), Daily Times (Lahore), April 25, 2008; Najam Sethi, “No Man’s Land” (op-ed), Friday Times (Lahore), May 23, 2008; “Pakistan Gives In to Terror” (editorial), Chicago Tribune, June 7, 2008; “Peace Had Its Chance” (editorial), Dawn (Karachi), June 26, 2008.

⁷⁶ “Pakistan Regime, Military at Odds,” McClatchy News, May 1, 2008; Najam Sethi, “Pakistan’s Make or Break Challenge” (op-ed), Friday Times (Lahore), October 17, 2008. Sharif himself vows to back the ruling coalition only if a formula emphasizing dialogue and reconciliation is pursued; he believes that military operations are counterproductive (“Nawaz Offers to Back Govt Consensus Anti-Terror Policy,” Daily Times (Lahore), October 22, 2008).

⁷⁷ “Pakistan Signs Peace Pact With Militants in Swat,” Reuters, May 21, 2008; “Peace Deal Depends on Shariah Enforcement,” Daily Times (Lahore), May 23, 2008.

in mid-month, pro-Taliban militants in Swat were reported to have “suspended” all contacts with the government. Fierce combat then continued through the summer.⁷⁸

Meanwhile, also in April, South Waziristan-based militant leader Baitullah Mehsud—named as a prime suspect in the assassination of Benazir Bhutto and in numerous other suicide bomb attacks inside Pakistan—ordered a ban on “provocative acts” by his loyalists. This fueled speculation that a peace agreement between government forces and militants was imminent; a 15-point draft truce accord reportedly was near conclusion. The truce would require the tribes to end all anti-government attacks and respect the state’s writ while allowing security forces full freedom of movement in the region. While the draft accord would require the tribes to expel all foreign militants from their territory, it reportedly lacked any mention of ending cross-border attacks in Afghanistan. Yet Mehsud subsequently announced his disengagement from the talks after the government refrained from ordering army units to withdraw from Waziristan.

More recently, the Saudi government is said to be mediating between Taliban and Afghan officials in an effort to wean the Taliban away from Al Qaeda. Riyadh’s key interest could be relieving pressure on its Pakistani friends. It is even possible that Pakistan’s ISI is seeking to engineer a split between the Taliban and Al Qaeda by “neutralizing” Pashtun militant leaders with close ties to Al Qaeda.⁷⁹ In mid-October, a TTP spokesman and close aide to Baitullah Mehsud reportedly offered unconditional talks with the Pakistani government, saying his militant group would lay down its arms if the military ended its FATA operations. Later in the month, militants fighting in Bajaur made a similar offer. Islamabad insists that disarmament must precede any halt to such operations.⁸⁰ A late October “mini-jirga” attended by 50 Pakistani and Afghan representatives—a continuation of the cross-border jirga process launched in August 2007—ended with an agreement to open dialogue with insurgent groups active near the shared border, including the Taliban. A Taliban spokesman rejected the call for dialogue as “worthless.”⁸¹

Pakistani Government Consensus?

An unprecedented October parliamentary debate on domestic security was organized by President Zardari in an effort to forge a political consensus on fighting militancy. Top Pakistani military officials, including the new ISI chief, gave extensive briefings to the National Assembly members who chose to attend. Yet the result was short of the kind of clarity the PPP leadership seeks; many parliamentarians came away skeptical of the government’s militarized approach and remained insistent on pursuing negotiations.⁸² When, on October 22, the Parliament unanimously adopted a 14-point anti-terrorism resolution, consensus was found on the recognition that, “Extremism, militancy, and terrorism in all forms and manifestations pose a grave danger to the stability and integrity of the country.” Yet a dialogue process was called the “highest priority” and “principal instrument” of efforts to address the threat, leading many analysts concerned that no political ⁷⁸“Peace Deal in With Swat Militants Scrapped,” Daily Times (Lahore), June 9, 2008; “Rehman Malik Shocks Army This Time,” News (Karachi), June 11, 2008; “Pakistan Militants ‘Suspend’ Deal,” BBC News, June 17, 2008.

⁷⁹“Saudi Hosts Taliban Talks to Bolster Pakistan,” Reuters, October 15, 2008; “Friends De-United,” Jane’s Terrorism and Security Monitor, October 22, 2008.

⁸⁰“Pakistan Taliban ‘Want to Talk,’” BBC News, October 15, 2008; “Bajaur Taliban ‘to Lay Down Arms,’” BBC News, October 30, 2008.

⁸¹“Pakistani, Afghan Elders Aim to Open Taliban Talks,” New York Times, October 28, 2008.

⁸²“Pakistani Legislators Show Little Appetite for a Fight,” New York Times, October 21, 2008; Khalid Aziz, “Talking Peace With Militants” (op-ed) News (Karachi), October 21, 2008.

consensus can be found in support of a militarized approach, even if such an approach is only one facet of a greater strategy.⁸³

Pakistan's top military leadership fully supports the PPP-led government's efforts to reach a political consensus on counterterrorism policies. Circumstances appear to dictate that Pakistan's military and political leaders recognize a mutual need for cooperation: the civilian government needs the army to carry out its counterterrorism policies, and the army seeks the legitimacy for such efforts that only political backing can bring.⁸⁴

U.S. Response to Pakistani Deal-Making

The Bush Administration at first issued mixed messages about Pakistani government negotiations with religious extremists. In response to spring 2008 talks, the White House expressed concern and encouraged Pakistan to "continue to fight against the terrorists." Yet, on the same day, Assistant Secretary of State Boucher said "we're supportive" of a dialogue process that could put a stop to violence, calling such dialogue a core aspect of any successful counterinsurgency effort. He opined that past efforts had failed not because the agreements themselves were flawed, but because they were not enforceable, and he also conceded that U.S. government knowledge of the details had been limited.⁸⁵ In ensuing discussions with Pakistani officials, the Bush Administration sought to clearly convey the importance of reaching agreements that end cross-border attacks in Afghanistan, as well as those within Pakistan itself. U.S. officials believe that regional stability depends on such conditions.⁸⁶

Islamabad and Washington may increasingly be at odds over counterterrorism strategy. An emphasis on negotiation alarms U.S. officials, who are concerned that such a tack would only allow extremist elements the space in which to consolidate their own positions, as appeared to be the case when truces were struck in 2005 and 2006 (see also "Infiltration Into Afghanistan" section below). Secretary of Defense Gates has cautioned Islamabad against negotiating with pro-Taliban militants, saying past efforts had failed.⁸⁷ During a March 2008 visit to Islamabad, Deputy Secretary of State Negroponte averred that "irreconcilable elements" cannot be dealt with through negotiation. In May, Negroponte was emphatic about U.S. apprehensions:

Let me be clear: we will not be satisfied until all the violent extremism emanating from the FATA is brought under control. It is unacceptable for extremists to use those areas to plan, train for, or execute attacks against Afghanistan, Pakistan, or the wider world.⁸⁸

⁸³ "Historic 14-Point Anti-Terrorism Resolution Adopted Unanimously," and "A Dangerous Lack of Consensus" (editorial), both Daily Times (Lahore), October 23, 2008; "Pakistan Rejects 'America's War' on Extremists," Guardian (London), October 24, 2008.

⁸⁴ "JCSC Backs Govt Efforts Against Terror," Daily Times (Lahore), October 12, 2008; "Hasan-Askari Rizvi, 'The Beginning of a Genuine Partnership?'" (op-ed), Friday Times (Lahore), October 12, 2008.

⁸⁵ "U.S. Unhappy With Pakistani Plan for Militant Peace Deal," CNN.com, April 23, 2008; Boucher's April 2008, comments at <http://www.state.gov/p/sca/rls/2008/104042.htm>.

⁸⁶ "Press Briefing by National Security Advisor Stephen Hadley on the President's Trip to Europe," June 4, 2008; "U.S. is Uneasy as Pakistan Bargains With Militants," Los Angeles Times, June 15, 2008.

⁸⁷ "Pakistan's Planned Accord With Militants Alarms U.S.," New York Times, April 30, 2008; "Pakistan Needs More Time to Tackle Militants: US," Daily Times (Lahore), May 31, 2008.

⁸⁸ See <http://www.state.gov/s/d/2008/104366.htm>. Waziri militant commander Baitullah Mehsud himself refuses to recognize the Durand Line as a legitimate frontier, and he explicitly rules out any end to the "jihad in Afghanistan" ("Pakistani Taliban Leader Vows Jihad in Afghanistan," Reuters, May 24, 2008).

Some analysts are concerned that the targeted killings of as many as 500 pro-government tribal elders in the FATA in recent years has made current efforts to drive a wedge between the militants and the local tribes extremely difficult.⁸⁹

The U.S. government flatly rejects seeking reconciliation with Taliban elements through dialogue, but continues to support (while not participating in) a jirga process in both Pakistan and Afghanistan that is meant to bring reconcilable Pashtun elements into the political structure.⁹⁰ While in Pakistan in mid-October, Assistant Secretary Boucher reiterated a general U.S. aversion to any negotiation process that could allow “terrorists” to consolidate their capabilities, as has been the case in the past. But he also recognized the need for political solutions as well as military ones, saying that people who abjure violence, accept the government’s writ, and expel foreign extremist elements should be part of a dialogue process. Boucher cast doubt on the value of reported dialogue with Taliban elements whom he considers to be insincere and still embracing of violent tactics.⁹¹

U.S.-Pakistan Counterterrorism Cooperation

Increasing Islamist militancy in Pakistan has elicited acute U.S. government attention and multiple high-level visits. Some of President Bush’s top military and intelligence aides reportedly sought and, in July, won his authorization for more energetic direct U.S. military action on Pakistani soil, perhaps to include sending special forces units into the FATA. Pentagon officials are said to be increasingly frustrated by the allegedly feckless counterinsurgency efforts of the internally squabbling Islamabad government.⁹² The New York Times reports that, since 2004, the U.S. military has used secret authority to carry out covert attacks against Al Qaeda and other militants in several countries, including Pakistan.⁹³ Some reports suggest that U.S. officials are frustrated by signs that the Pakistani military is slow to shift away from a conventional war strategy focused on India, and they have made clear the United States stands ready to assist Pakistan in “reorienting” its army for counterinsurgency efforts. Some U.S. military commanders in Afghanistan are reported to be deeply skeptical that Islamabad will use future U.S. military assistance for its intended purposes.⁹⁴ Adm. Mullen himself calls for a calm approach to building effective teamwork with the Pakistanis, saying their military leaders understand the nature of the threat.⁹⁵ Many analysts warn that allowing tensions to grow in the U.S.-Pakistan bilateral military relationship only helps Al Qaeda and other extremist groups by fueling anti-American sentiments.⁹⁶

⁸⁹ “Militants’ Rise in Pakistan Points to Opportunity Lost,” Los Angeles Times, June 8, 2008; “Pakistan Uses Tribal Militias in Taliban War,” New York Times, October 24, 2008.

⁹⁰ See <http://www.state.gov/p/sca/rls/2008/111459.htm>.

⁹¹ See <http://www.state.gov/p/sca/rls/rm/2008/111084.htm>.

⁹² “US Weighs Tougher Forays Into Pakistan,” Associated Press, August 9, 2008; “U.S. Debates Going After Militants in Pakistan,” Los Angeles Times, August 23, 2008.

⁹³ “Secret Order Lets U.S. Raid Al Qaeda in Many Countries,” New York Times, November 10, 2008.

⁹⁴ “Sen. Carl Levin and Sen. Bob Casey Hold a News Conference on Their Trip to Pakistan and Afghanistan,” CQ Transcriptions, June 3, 2008.

⁹⁵ “Mullen Counsels Caution in Working With Pakistanis,” Associated Press, September 26, 2008.

⁹⁶ See, for example, Lisa Curtis, “U.S. Strategy Must Address Afghan-Pakistan Tension,” Heritage Foundation WebMemo No. 2087, September 26, 2008.

The explicit U.S. readiness to increase bilateral counterterrorism cooperation is described by some as being expressed to Islamabad in the form of “pressure.” Former President Musharraf rejected suggestions that U.S. troops could be more effective than Pakistanis in battling Islamist militants, asserting that a direct U.S. military presence in Pakistan is neither necessary nor acceptable. Upon assuming the presidency, Asif Zardari warned that Pakistan “will not tolerate the violation of [its] sovereignty and territorial integrity by any power in the name of combatting terrorism.” He, too, insists that, with the provision of U.S. intelligence, Pakistani forces are better suited to tracking and capturing terrorists in the border region.⁹⁷ Many independent commentators warn that a U.S. policy shift toward increased military incursions on Pakistani territory is unlikely to contribute meaningfully to the stabilization of Afghanistan and could badly damage the U.S.-Pakistan relationship, perhaps even leading to a curtailment of bilateral military and intelligence cooperation, which themselves may be the key to long-term success in the fight against Pashtun and other insurgents.⁹⁸

In January 2008, America’s two top intelligence officials undertook a “secret” trip to Islamabad, where they reportedly made an effort to convince President Musharraf to allow expanded direct U.S. military presence in his country.⁹⁹ Shortly after, the senior-most U.S. military officer, Adm. Mullen, was in Islamabad to discuss with top Pakistani officials new ways to bolster joint counterterrorism cooperation, such as offers to Pakistan of expanded counterinsurgency training, and vital equipment such as transport helicopters and communications and surveillance gear.¹⁰⁰ In May, the Acting Commander of the U.S. Central Command, Lt. Gen. Dempsey, made a Pakistan visit that some analysts saw as part of increasing U.S. pressure on Pakistan to maintain an aggressive counterterrorism posture. In June, Under Secretary of Defense Eric Edelman discussed ongoing U.S.-Pakistan defense and security cooperation with officials in Islamabad, particularly in the areas of intelligence sharing and counterterrorism. In August, State Department Coordinator for Counterterrorism Dell Dailey was in Pakistan for a fifth meeting of the U.S.-Pakistan Joint Working Group on Counterterrorism and Law Enforcement.

The United States has built two new coordination and intelligence-sharing centers on the Afghan side of the shared border near the Khyber Pass. Four more such sites reportedly are being considered. Hundreds of millions of dollars of U.S. aid is slated to go toward training and equipping more than 8,000 paramilitary Frontier Corps (FC) troops by mid-2010. The Chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Senator Carl Levin, who returned from a May 2008 trip to the region with serious doubts about the intentions of the Pakistani government, may seek to condition future FC aid funds on Pakistan’s demonstrated commitment to halting cross-border infiltration. Several fellow Senators are said to support such conditionality. Some reports suggest that distrust aggravated by the June airstrike on Pakistani territory jeopardized the FC program, but some two dozen U.S. trainers began work in October.¹⁰¹ In September, the Afghan defense

⁹⁷ “Special Ops Chief Sees Opportunities to Assist Pakistani Military,” Inside the Pentagon, February 7, 2008; “Pakistan’s Musharraf Says No to US Troops,” Associated Press, January 24, 2008; <http://www.pid.gov.pk/Final%20Speech%20of%20President.doc>; “Zardari to U.S.: Let Pakistan Go After Terrorists” (interview), MSNBC.com, September 22, 2008.

⁹⁸ See, for example, Marvin Weinbaum, “Wrong Way in Pakistan” (op-ed), Washington Post, October 27, 2008.

⁹⁹ “Top U.S. Intel Officials in Secret Trip to Pakistan,” Associated Press, January 29, 2008.

¹⁰⁰ “U.S. to Step Up Training of Pakistanis,” Washington Post, January 24, 2008. The British government also is assisting Pakistan’s military with counterinsurgency training (“UK Helps Pakistan Fight Militants,” BBC News, March 3, 2008). See also CRS Report RS21048, U.S. Special Operations Forces (SOF): Background and Issues for Congress.

¹⁰¹ “Sen. Carl Levin and Sen. Bob Casey Hold a News Conference on Their Trip to Pakistan and Afghanistan,” CQ Transcriptions, June 3, 2008; “Pakistani Fury Over Airstrikes Imperils Training,” New York Times, June 18, 2008; (continued...)

minister raised the idea of a joint U.S.-Pakistan-Afghanistan military force to patrol the border area, a new proposal that U.S. military leaders welcomed.¹⁰² Despite ongoing bilateral discord, there are signs of improved military-to-military coordination along the Pakistan-Afghanistan border.¹⁰³

U.S. military incursions into Pakistan—especially those involving ground troops—put tremendous pressure on both Islamabad’s civilian government and on the country’s military. Some observers fear the attacks will undermine both the civilian government, whose legitimacy depends in part on a perception that it is serving the national interest, as well as the military, which comes under pressure to protect not only Pakistani territory, but also its own reputation.¹⁰⁴ Others see such actions as potentially leading to the curtailment of Pakistan’s military cooperation with the United States, something Islamabad’s opposition parliamentarians have already threatened.¹⁰⁵ Moreover, Pakistan’s Ambassador to the United States warns that such attacks are counterproductive to the extent that they turn Pakistani public opinion against the counterterrorism effort. Many Pakistani editorialists echo this concern, with one offering that, “If you bomb a moderate sensibility often enough it has a tendency to lose its sense of objectivity and to feel driven in the direction of extremism.”¹⁰⁶ One former Bush State Department official assesses that unilateral U.S. military activity on Pakistani territory can be “profoundly counterproductive” by empowering Pakistani elements who already distrust U.S. intentions.¹⁰⁷ Even Deputy Secretary of State Negroponte has conceded that, “Unilateral actions are probably not a durable or a viable solution over a prolonged period of time” and suggested that trilateral cooperation among the United States, Pakistan, and Afghanistan was the best way forward.¹⁰⁸

Cross-Border Coordination and U.S. Military Action

American commanders in Afghanistan reportedly seek greater leeway to attack indigenous Pakistani militants on Pakistani soil. Permission for U.S.-led attacks on forces under the command of militant leaders such as Sirajuddin Haqqani and Baitullah Mehsud is not overtly forthcoming to date.¹⁰⁹ By one account, top Bush Administration officials in late 2007 drafted a

(...continued)

“U.S. Debates Going After Militants in Pakistan,” Los Angeles Times, August 23, 2008.

¹⁰² “U.S., Afghans and Pakistanis Consider Joint Military Force,” Washington Post, September 23, 2008.

¹⁰³ “Beneath US-Pakistani Tension, A New Cooperation,” Christian Science Monitor, October 29, 2008; <http://www.nato.int/isaf/docu/pressreleases/2008/10-october/pr081011-522.html>.

¹⁰⁴ “US Raid Complicating Pakistani’s Presidential Bid,” Associated Press, September 4, 2008; “US Air Attack Could Shake Zardari Regime,” Financial Times (London), September 8, 2008; “Playing With Firepower,” London Sunday Times, September 14, 2008; Hasan-Askari Rizvi, “Double-Speak” (op-ed), Daily Times (Lahore), September 21, 2008.

¹⁰⁵ Rodney Jones, “American Boot, Pakistani Soil: Solution?,” (op-ed), Friday Times (Lahore), September 12, 2008;

“Pakistan Could End Cooperation in War on Terror,” Associated Press, September 12, 2008; Robert Baer, “Washington is Risking War With Pakistan” (op-ed), Time, September 17, 2008; Tariq Ali, “The American War Moves to Pakistan” (op-ed), Outlook (Delhi), September 17, 2008.

¹⁰⁶ “U.S. Raids Hurt Cause By Angering Pakistanis - Envoy,” Reuters, September 5, 2008; “Enough, Uncle Sam” (editorial), News (Karachi), September 12, 2008. See also “Unwise US Policy” (editorial), Dawn (Karachi), September 12, 2008, and “US Strategy: Excessive and Unnecessary” (editorial), Daily Times (Lahore), September 13, 2008.

¹⁰⁷ See the statement of Daniel Markey before the House Government Reform and Oversight Subcommittee on National Security and Foreign Affairs, September 24, 2008.

¹⁰⁸ See <http://www.state.gov/s/d/2008/109857.htm>.

¹⁰⁹ “U.S. Commanders Seeking to Widen Pakistan Attacks,” New York Times, April 20, 2008. U.S. military forces operating in the FATA would likely face significant resistance from well-armed tribesmen with a proud martial history. (continued...)

secret plan to facilitate U.S. Special Operations force missions in western Pakistan, a plan that the U.S. President may have approved in July 2008. Pakistan's army chief strongly denied that his country had agreed to any new rules of engagement that would permit U.S. ground forces to operate inside Pakistan. As part of the Joint Statement issued following a September session of the U.S.-Pakistan Strategic Dialogue, the United States reiterated "support for Pakistan's sovereignty, independence, unity, and territorial integrity."¹¹⁰

U.S.-led coalition forces at times come under artillery fire launched on the Pakistani side of the border. Mid-July reports of a major buildup of U.S.-led coalition forces in eastern Afghanistan triggered alarm in Pakistan, where fears of a "foreign invasion" are exacerbated by cross-border military action. According to a NATO spokesman, "There is no planning for, no mandate for, an incursion of NATO troops into Pakistan."¹¹¹ Airstrikes and rumors of potential U.S. ground incursions "seriously undermine" the Pakistani people's support for the Islamabad government, according to the NWFP governor.¹¹²

June Frontier Corps Deaths

On June 10, a unit of Pakistani paramilitary soldiers was caught up in a firefight between Taliban militants and U.S.-led coalition forces at the border Pakistan-Afghanistan border in the Mohmand tribal agency. U.S. air assets, apparently targeting fleeing insurgents, delivered 12 gravity bombs on Pakistani territory and killed 11 Frontier Corps soldiers. Islamabad strongly condemned the airstrike, calling it "unprovoked" and "a gross violation of the international border" that "tends to undermine the very basis of our cooperation." A Pakistani military statement called the airstrike "cowardly," and some in Pakistan believe the country's troops were intentionally targeted.¹¹³ On June 13, Secretary of State Rice met with Foreign Minister Qureshi following a Afghanistan aid conference in Paris, where both officials supported the idea of a joint military investigation. Secretary Rice expressed regret for the deaths of Pakistani soldiers.¹¹⁴ The findings of what in the end were separate investigations reportedly were incompatible, with U.S. analysts claiming the border post in question was erroneously omitted from an American database used to prevent accidental attacks on friendly forces, a claim was rejected by the Pakistani military.¹¹⁵ The NWFP Provincial Assembly passed multiple resolutions condemning the airstrikes, and the incident

(...continued)

The military strength of the FATA tribes is unclear, but one estimate counts some 200,000 young, unemployed males who could be considered potential fighters, especially against what was perceived to be a foreign invasion. Also among the radical Islamist militants operating in the FATA are an estimated 2,000 battle-hardened Uzbeks (Brian Cloughley, "Insurrection in Pakistan's Tribal Areas," Pakistan Security Research Unit Brief 29, January 24, 2008; "Open Borders and the Militant Uzbeks of Pakistan," Jane's Intelligence Digest, January 25, 2008).

¹¹⁰ "Bush Said to Give Orders Allowing Raids in Pakistan," New York Times, September 10, 2008; "Pakistan Did Not Agree to New Rules, Officials Say," Washington Post, September 12, 2008; <http://www.state.gov/r/pa/prs/ps/2008/sept/110444.htm>.

¹¹¹ "US Troops Poised to Cross Afghan Border for Raid on Bases," Times (London), July 16, 2008; "Afghan NATO Force Hits Targets Inside Pakistan," Reuters, July 16, 2008.

¹¹² "Pakistan Fears Over US Air Raids," BBC News, July 14, 2008. See also "Unilateral Action by U.S. a Growing Fear in Pakistan," New York Times, July 22, 2008.

¹¹³ See http://www.mofa.gov.pk/Press_Releases/2008/June/PR_164_08.htm; "Pakistan Says U.S. Airstrike Killed 11 of Its Soldiers," New York Times, June 10, 2008.

¹¹⁴ See http://www.mofa.gov.pk/Press_Releases/2008/June/PR_173_08.htm.

¹¹⁵ "Pakistan Post Was Not in U.S. Records," New York Times, July 16, 2008; "Pakistan Disputes U.S. Air Strike Due to Database Gap," Reuters, July 17, 2008.

served to inflame already sensitive bilateral relations and could lead to a diminution in cooperative efforts to stem cross-border attacks.¹¹⁶

September U.S. Special Forces Raid

In the early morning hours of September 3, U.S. special forces troops apparently staged a helicopter raid in the South Waziristan village of Angoor Adda, where at least 20 people were reported killed, women and children among them. The Pakistani government strongly condemned the “completely unprovoked act of killing” and lodged formal protests with the U.S. Embassy for the “gross violation of Pakistan’s territory” and “grave provocation.” Both chambers of the Pakistani Parliament issued unanimous resolutions strongly condemning the “cowardly” attack. The U.S. government did not comment on the reports, but the action was viewed by some as an indication that U.S. forces would become more aggressive in attacking Taliban and other Islamist militant forces inside Pakistan.¹¹⁷ The raid may have been an effort to demonstrate to Pakistani leaders that U.S. patience is nearing an end.

In a strongly-worded September 10 statement, Army Chief Gen. Kayani said, “The sovereignty and territorial integrity of the country will be defended at all cost and no external force is allowed to conduct operations inside Pakistan.... There is no question of any agreement or understanding with the Coalition Forces whereby they are allowed to conduct operations on our side of the border.” Prime Minister Gillani later confirmed that Kayani’s statement reflected government opinion. An army spokesman reportedly said Pakistani soldiers were given orders to retaliate against any incursions by foreign troops. According to Pakistan’s National Security Advisor, the September ground incursion had a “double negative effect” by eliciting greater scrutiny on and opposition to aerial attacks by pilotless U.S. drones, which he calls counterproductive “spoilers.”¹¹⁸ Plans for further U.S. ground incursions reportedly have been suspended to allow the Pakistani military to press its own attacks, although some observers say the Pentagon had underestimated the strength of the Pakistani response to cross-border raids. The backlash may have caused U.S. officials to focus only on an intensified Predator missile strike campaign.¹¹⁹

Aerial Drone Attacks

Missile strikes in Pakistan launched by armed, unmanned American Predator aircraft have been a controversial, but sometimes effective tactic against Islamist militants in remote regions of western Pakistan. Pakistani press reports suggest that such drones “violate Pakistani airspace” on a daily basis. By some accounts, U.S. officials reached a quiet January understanding with President Musharraf to allow for increased employment of U.S. aerial surveillance and Predator

¹¹⁶ “Pakistan’s Provincial Assembly Condemns US Air Strikes in Tribal Area,” BBC Monitoring South Asia, June 20, 2008; “US Strikes Undercut Efforts on Pakistan-Afghan Border,” Associated Press, June 11, 2008; “Air Strike Damages Trust in Pakistan-US Alliance,” Reuters, June 12, 2008.

¹¹⁷ See <http://www.ispr.gov.pk/Archive&Press/Sep2008/3-sep-2008.htm>; http://www.mofa.gov.pk/Press_Releases/Printer_Friendly/Sep/PR_Print_264_08.htm; “Pakistan Raid May Signal More U.S. Attacks,” Reuters, September 4, 2008.

¹¹⁸ See <http://www.ispr.gov.pk/Archive&Press/Sep2008/10-Sep-2008.htm>; “Leader Backs Rebuke of U.S.,” Associated Press, September 11, 2008; “Army Ordered to Hit Back,” News (Karachi), September 12, 2008; “‘No Predators, Please’” (interview), Newsweek, November 17, 2008.

¹¹⁹ “U.S. Stops Spec Ops Raids Into Pakistani Tribal Areas,” Army Times, October 6, 2008; “United States Takes to Air to Hit Militants Inside Pakistan,” New York Times, October 27, 2008.

strikes on Pakistani territory. Musharraf's successor, President Zardari, may even have struck a secret accord with U.S. officials involving better bilateral coordination for Predator attacks and a jointly approved target list. Neither Washington nor Islamabad offers official confirmation of Predator strikes on Pakistani territory; there are conflicting reports on the question of the Pakistani government's alleged tacit permission for such operations.¹²⁰ Three Predators are said to be deployed at a secret Pakistani airbase and can be launched without specific permission from the Islamabad government (Pakistan officially denies the existence of any such bases).¹²¹ Pentagon officials eager to increase the use of armed drones in Pakistan reportedly meet resistance from State Department diplomats who fear that Pakistani resentments built up in response to sovereignty violations and to the deaths of civilians are harmful to U.S. interests, outweighing potential gains.

A flurry of suspected Predator drone attacks on Pakistani territory in the latter months of 2008 suggests a shift in tactics in the effort to neutralize Al Qaeda and other Islamist militants in the border region. As of November 10, at least 14 suspected Predator attacks had been made on Pakistani territory since July, compared with only three reported during all of 2007. Such missile strikes have killed at least 100 people, including numerous suspected foreign fighters, but also women and children. The new Commander of the U.S. Central Command, Gen. David Petraeus, claims that such strikes in western Pakistan are "extremely important" and have killed three top extremist leaders in that region.¹²²

Officially, Pakistan's Foreign Ministry calls Predator attacks "destabilizing" that are "helping the terrorists." Strident Pakistani government reaction has included summoning the U.S. Ambassador to lodge a strong protest, and condemnation of missile attacks that Islamabad believes "undermine public support for the government's counterterrorism efforts" and should be "stopped immediately." During his first visit to Pakistan as Centcom chief in early November, Gen. Petraeus reportedly was met with a single overriding message from Pakistani interlocutors: cross-border U.S. military strikes in the FATA are counterproductive. Pakistan's defense minister warned Gen. Petraeus that the strikes were creating "bad blood" and contribute to anti-American outrage among ordinary Pakistanis. President Zardari has called on President-Elect Obama to reassess the Bush Administration policy of employing aerial attacks on Pakistani territory.¹²³

¹²⁰ "US Launches Waziristan UAV Strike With Tacit Pakistani Approval," Jane's Defense Weekly, March 19, 2008; "David Ignatius, 'A Quiet Deal With Pakistan' (op-ed), New York Times, November 4, 2008. In October 2008, Pakistan's Ambassador to the United States acknowledged that there is "definitely" bilateral cooperation "in using strategic equipment that is used against specific targets," but that U.S. military aircraft do not overfly or launch strikes on Pakistani territory (see <http://www.cfr.org/publication/17567>).

¹²¹ "Unilateral Strike Called a Model for U.S. Operations in Pakistan," Washington Post, February 19, 2008. In mid-2008, the Predator drones operating in the Pakistan-Afghanistan border region reportedly were fitted with sophisticated new surveillance systems that were employed successfully in Iraq. These systems allow for much better tracking of human targets, even those inside buildings ("Higher-Tech Predators Targeting Pakistan," Los Angeles Times, September 12, 2008).

¹²² "In Hunt For Bin Laden, A New Approach," Washington Post, September 10, 2008; "U.S. Airstrike Killed Key Al Qaeda Figure in Pakistan, Officials Say," Los Angeles Times, October 31, 2008; "Petraeus: Afghan Tribes Needed to Fight Militants," Associated Press, November 6, 2008.

¹²³ "Pakistan Condemns US Strikes in Border Regions," Associated Press, October 10, 2008; http://www.mofa.gov.pk/Press_Releases/2008/Oct/PR_331_08.htm; "U.S. Airstrikes Creating Tension, Pakistan Warns," Washington Post, November 3, 2008; "Pakistani Leader Seeks New US Policy," Associated Press, November 10, 2008.

Pakistan-India Relations

Among the top goals of Indian officials in 2008 has been gauging the new Pakistani government's commitment to the bilateral peace process. Within this modest context, the outcome was viewed as generally positive. However, ensuing months have seen a deterioration of Pakistan-India relations, and some in New Delhi express frustration that the new civilian leaders in Islamabad have little influence over Pakistan's powerful military and intelligence agencies.¹²⁴ In May, India accused Pakistan of committing multiple cease-fire and territorial violations along the Kashmiri Line of Control (LOC); one incident left an Indian soldier dead. Reported violations continued and Indian officials suspect the Pakistani military was renewing its alleged practice of providing cover fire for militant infiltrations into Indian Kashmir.¹²⁵ June visits to Islamabad by the Indian foreign minister and later by Foreign Minister Qureshi to New Delhi were cordial and appeared to get the peace process back on track, but produced no new initiatives. Then, on July 7, a suicide car bomb killed 58 people, including 4 Indian nationals, at the Indian Embassy in Kabul, Afghanistan. Afghan and Indian officials claimed that Pakistan's intelligence agency was complicit, a charge later echoed by Washington.¹²⁶

Later in July, Foreign Secretary Bashir met with his Indian counterpart in New Delhi to launch the fifth round of the bilateral Composite Dialogue. Following the meeting, the Indian diplomat warned that recent events—culminating in the embassy bombing—had brought the peace process “under stress.” Blunt language again followed a high-level meeting in Sri Lanka, when the same Indian official suggested that Pakistan-India relations were at a four-year low ebb.¹²⁷ Along with the Kabul bombing, Indians widely suspect Pakistani complicity in late July terrorist attacks inside India, and India's Prime Minister has warned that such terrorism could bring the bilateral peace process to a halt. More recently, India's defense minister suggested that Pakistan may have provided assistance to the perpetrators of a series of lethal bomb attacks in the Indian capital in mid-September. Moreover, New Delhi's progress in an initiative that would allow India to purchase nuclear materials and technologies on the international market spurred Islamabad to warn of a potential new nuclear arms race on the Asian subcontinent.¹²⁸

Renewed violence in India's Jammu and Kashmir state has further exacerbated bilateral tensions. When the Pakistani Senate passed a resolution on the increasingly incendiary situation, an Indian official called the move “gross interference” in India's internal affairs. The exchange was soon repeated when the Foreign Minister Qureshi decried “excessive and unwarranted use of force” in Kashmir by the Indian government, a charge rejected as unhelpful by New Delhi. The Islamabad government has conveyed “deep concern” at reports of perceived human rights violations in ¹²⁴ “India Frustrated by a Rudderless Pakistan,” New York Times, August 12, 2008; “India Yearns for Pakistan's Musharraf Amid Turmoil,” Associated Press, August 12, 2008.

¹²⁵ “India to Protest to Pakistan Over Border Shooting,” Reuters, May 19, 2008; “Skirmishes Can Hurt India-Pakistan Peace Process,” Reuters, July 30, 2008; “Despite Warning, Pak Violates Ceasefire Again,” Times of India (Delhi), August 14, 2008.

¹²⁶ “Pakistan ‘Behind Afghan Attacks,’” BBC News, July 14, 2008; “India Blames Pakistan in Embassy Bombing,” Associated Press, July 21, 2008; “Pakistanis Aided Attack in Kabul, U.S. Officials Say,” New York Times, August 1, 2008.

¹²⁷ “Briefing by Foreign Secretary After India-Pakistan Foreign Secretary-Level Talks,” Indian Ministry of External Affairs, July 21, 2008; “India Official Sees Sinking Relations With Pakistan,” New York Times, August 1, 2008.

¹²⁸ “India Says Peace Talks With Pakistan Under Threat,” Associated Press, August 15, 2008; “India Suggests Pakistani Hand in New Delhi Blasts,” Associated Press, September 15, 2008; “Pakistan Warns of New Nuclear Arms Race With India,” Associated Press, July 23, 2008.

Indian Kashmir.¹²⁹ In August, the Indian national security advisor expressed worry at the possibly imminent removal from office of Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf, saying such a development would “leave radical extremist outfits with freedom to do what they like” in the region.¹³⁰

In mid-October, Pakistani National Security Advisor Mahmoud Ali Durrani was in New Delhi for meetings with top Indian officials. Durrani and his Indian counterpart had “very cordial” and “most productive” talks on matters of mutual concern. Yet, within days, Indian officials were again accusing Pakistan of violating the Kashmir cease-fire after five suspected separatist militants were killed as they tried to cross the LOC into Indian Kashmir, the third reported infiltration attempt in an eight-day period. Meanwhile, the Islamabad government continued to criticize New Delhi’s Kashmir policies, calling the recent uprising in Indian Kashmir “entirely indigenous” and urging India to “restrain its security forces” and “bring the atrocities against Kashmiris to an end.”¹³¹

Selected Commentary on Future U.S. Policy Options

Numerous observers are identifying Pakistan as being among the most important foreign policy issues facing President-Elect Barack Obama, who will take office in January 2009. In addressing the several policy dilemmas posed by Pakistan, most analyses urge a greater U.S. emphasis on diplomacy and development aid; many include a corresponding call for de-emphasizing strictly militarized approaches to regional issues. Some notable recent commentary includes:

- A New Course for Pakistan, from the Center for Strategic and International Studies, bases its recommendations for U.S. policy on the findings of more than 200 personal interviews in Pakistan during April 2008. In concluding that Pakistanis broadly recognize the current transitional period as a critical moment in the country’s history, the authors endorse a more strategic U.S. approach to Pakistan that would include decreasing reliance on the Pakistani military. They urge a closer U.S. focus on strengthening rule of law and governance in Pakistan, as well as on stabilizing that country’s economy and ensuring security both along the Pakistan-Afghanistan border and across the country.¹³²
- The Pakistan Policy Working Group, comprised of 13 Washington-based experts, released a major report on the future of U.S.-Pakistan relations, which argues that, “Pakistan may be the single greatest challenge facing the next American President.” The report offers a series of key recommendations for U.S. policy, including exhibiting patience with Islamabad’s new civilian leadership while working to stabilize their government with economic aid and diplomacy.¹³³

¹²⁹ Indian Ministry of External Affairs Press Briefing, August 7, 2008; “India Reacts ‘Strongly’ to Pakistan Comments on Kashmir Violence,” BBC Monitoring South Asia, August 12, 2008; Pakistan Ministry of Foreign Affairs statement at http://www.mofa.gov.pk/Press_Releases/2008/Aug/PR_247_08.htm.

¹³⁰ “Q&A With Indian National Security Advisor MK Narayanan,” Straits Times (Singapore), August 12, 2008.

¹³¹ See http://www.mofa.gov.pk/Press_Releases/2008/Oct/PR_312_08.htm; “India Says Pakistan Violating Truce, 5 Rebels Dead,” Reuters, October 28, 2008; http://www.mofa.gov.pk/Spokesperson/2008/Oct/Spokes_31_10_08.html.

¹³² See http://www.csis.org/media/isis/pubs/080514_sb_pakistanrip.pdf.

¹³³ See <http://www.cfr.org/content/publications/attachments/PakistanPolicyWorkingGroupReport.pdf>.

- In a late 2008 Foreign Affairs article, two senior regional analysts warn that neither adding more U.S. and Western troops in Afghanistan nor increasing cross-border attacks into Pakistan is likely to improve the regional security situation. Instead, they argue for political and diplomatic initiatives that would distinguish between local militants and global jihadists such as Al Qaeda, offer inclusion to a wide array of reconcilable insurgent elements in both Afghanistan and Pakistan, and include a major development initiative to boost living standards there. They view a U.S. policy of “pressuring” Pakistan to be inherently flawed in the absence of efforts to address Islamabad’s fundamental sources of insecurity.¹³⁴
- One Carnegie Endowment-based analyst offers a five-point strategy for the next U.S. presidential administration, urging it to: (1) strengthen Islamabad’s civilian government so as to consolidate democracy and convey respect for the wishes of the Pakistani people; (2) invest in improving Pakistan’s human capital and support its civil society with a focus on education and health services; (3) help Pakistan in its struggle against terrorism and radicalism with security assistance that improves counterinsurgency capabilities; (4) encourage reconciliation between Pakistan and India; and (5) foster South Asian economic integration.¹³⁵

Other Notable Recent Developments

- On November 10, at least a dozen trucks carrying Humvees and other supplies for Western military forces in Afghanistan were hijacked by pro-Taliban militants at the Khyber Pass.
- On November 9, two men were killed by a bomb blast and landmine explosion in Baluchistan.
- On November 8, pro-Taliban militants killed two men accused of being “U.S. spies” in North Waziristan.
- On November 7, missiles possibly launched from a Predator drone killed up to 13 suspected militants in a North Waziristan village.
- On November 6, as many as 22 people were killed when a suicide bomber attacked a meeting of pro-government tribal elders in Bajaur.
- Also on November 6, two paramilitary soldiers were killed when a suicide bomber attacked their post in the Swat Valley.
- On November 5, Pakistan released three Taliban militants who had been in custody since July in an exchange for the release of ten captured Pakistani soldiers.
- On November 4, a soldier was killed when a suicide bomber attacked his paramilitary post in the NWFP.

¹³⁴ See <http://www.foreignaffairs.org/20081001faessay87603/barnett-r-rubin-ahmed-rashid/from-great-game-to-grand-bargain.html>.

¹³⁵ See http://www.carnegieendowment.org/files/pb64_tellis_pakistan_final.pdf.

- On November 3, several thousand lawyers marked the first anniversary of former President Musharraf's emergency imposition by marching in protest in several cities.
- On November 2, new Commander of the U.S. Central Command Gen. Petraeus arrived in Islamabad accompanied by Assistant Secretary of State Boucher for meetings with top Pakistani officials.
- Also on November 2, eight soldiers were killed when a suicide car bomber attacked their convoy in Wana, South Waziristan.
- On October 31, missiles possibly launched from Predator drones struck two villages in the FATA: 20 people were reported killed in Mir Ali, North Waziristan, and another 7 were killed in South Waziristan hours later.
- On October 29, a "mini-jirga" meeting of 50 Pakistani and Afghan representatives ended with an agreement to seek dialogue with Taliban insurgents in both countries.
- Also on October 29, a magnitude 6.4 earthquake struck the Baluchistan province 80 miles northwest of Quetta, leaving at least 166 people dead.
- On October 28, Indian officials accused Pakistan of violating the Kashmir cease-fire after five suspected separatist militants were killed as they tried to cross the LOC into Indian Kashmir, the third reported infiltration attempt in an eight-day period.
- On October 27, missiles possibly launched from a Predator drone struck two houses in Shakai, South Waziristan, killing up to 20 suspected militants.
- Also on October 27, two people were killed when a car bomb exploded in Quetta.
- On October 26, a police informer and six family members were reportedly beheaded by pro-Taliban militants in the Swat Valley.
- On October 24, Pakistani and Indian officials held a special meeting of their Joint Anti-Terrorism Mechanism in New Delhi.
- On October 23, missiles possibly launched from a Predator drone struck a North Waziristan religious school reportedly operated by Taliban commander Sirajuddin Haqqani, killing at least ten people.
- On October 22, Afghanistan's foreign minister paid a visit to Islamabad, where he and Pakistani officials agreed to "comprehensively upgrade their bilateral relations" and to hold regular Strategic Dialogue sessions at the foreign minister-level.
- On October 16, missiles possibly launched from a Predator drone struck a village in South Waziristan, reportedly killing six people, including suspected Al Qaeda commander Khalid Habib.
- Also on October 16, four Pakistani security officials were reported killed and 26 wounded when suspected Islamist militants attacked a police station in the Swat Valley.
- On October 14, President Zardari began a four-day visit to China, his first as Pakistan's head of state.

- On October 11, missiles possibly launched from Predator drones struck a house in Miram Shah, North Waziristan, reportedly killing five suspected local militants.
- Also on October 11, National Security Advisor Mahmoud Ali durrani arrived in New Delhi for meetings with top Indian officials.
- On October 10, at least 40 people were reported killed when a suicide car bombers attacked a meeting of pro-government tribal leaders in Orakzai.
- Also on October 10, four pro-government tribal elders were beheaded by Taliban militants in Bajaur.

Setting and Regional Relations

Historical Setting

The long and checkered Pakistan-U.S. relationship has its roots in the Cold War and South Asia regional politics of the 1950s. U.S. concerns about Soviet expansionism and Pakistan's desire for security assistance against a perceived threat from India prompted the two countries to negotiate a mutual defense assistance agreement in 1954. By 1955, Pakistan had further aligned itself with the West by joining two regional defense pacts, the South East Asia Treaty Organization and the Central Treaty Organization (or "Baghdad Pact"). As a result of these alliances, Islamabad received nearly $2 billion in U.S. assistance from 1953 to 1961, one-quarter of this in military aid, making Pakistan one of America's most important security assistance partners of the period. President Dwight D. Eisenhower famously called Pakistan America's "most allied ally in Asia." Differing expectations of the security relationship long bedeviled bilateral ties, however. During and immediately after the Indo-Pakistani wars of 1965 and 1971, the United States suspended military assistance to both sides, resulting in a cooling of the Pakistan-U.S. relationship and a perception among many in Pakistan that the United States was not a reliable ally.

In the mid-1970s, new strains arose over Pakistan's efforts to respond to India's 1974 underground nuclear test by seeking its own nuclear weapons capability. U.S. aid was suspended by President Jimmy Carter in 1979 in response to Pakistan's covert construction of a uranium enrichment facility. However, following the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan later that year, Pakistan again was viewed as a frontline ally in the effort to block Soviet expansionism. In 1981, the Reagan Administration pledged for Islamabad a five-year, $3.2 billion aid package. Pakistan became a key transit country for arms supplies to the Afghan resistance, as well as home for millions of Afghan refugees, many of whom have yet to return.

Despite this renewal of U.S. aid and close security ties, many in Congress remained troubled by Pakistan's nuclear weapons program. In 1985, Section 620E(e) (the Pressler amendment) was added to the Foreign Assistance Act, requiring the President to certify to Congress that Pakistan does not possess a nuclear explosive device during the fiscal year for which aid is to be provided. With the Soviet withdrawal from Afghanistan, Pakistan's nuclear activities again came under intensive U.S. scrutiny and, in 1990, President George H.W. Bush again suspended aid to Pakistan. Under the provisions of the Pressler amendment, most bilateral economic and all military aid ended, and deliveries of major military equipment ceased. In 1992, Congress partially relaxed the scope of sanctions to allow for food assistance and continuing support for nongovernmental organizations. Among the notable results of the aid cutoff was the nondelivery of F-16 fighter aircraft purchased by Pakistan in 1989. Nine years later, the United States agreed to compensate Pakistan with a $325 million cash payment and $140 million worth of surplus wheat and soy, but the episode engendered lingering Pakistani resentments.

U.S. disengagement from Pakistan (and Afghanistan) after 1990 had serious and lasting effects on Pakistani perceptions. Even retired Army Chief and U.S. ally President Musharraf himself repeatedly voiced a narrative in which Pakistan joined the United States to “wage a jihad” in Afghanistan in the 1980s, only to see “disaster” follow when the “military victory was bungled up” and the United States then left the region “abandoned totally.” When combined with ensuing sanctions on U.S. aid, this left many Pakistanis with the sense they had been “used and ditched.”¹³⁶ The new Pakistani President, Asif Zardari, has taken up a similar narrative, telling the U.N. General Assembly in September 2008 that, “The world turned its back on Afghanistan after the Soviet defeat,” leaving Pakistan with three million Afghan refugees in camps that “soon became breeding grounds for intolerance and violence.... We were left to deal with the consequences.”¹³⁷

During the 1990s, with U.S. attention shifted away from the region, Islamabad further consolidated its nuclear weapons capability, fanned the flames of a growing separatist insurgency in neighboring Indian-controlled Kashmir, and nurtured the Taliban movement in Afghanistan, where the radical Islamist group took control of Kabul in 1996. After this more than one decade of alienation, U.S. relations with Pakistan were once again transformed in dramatic fashion, this time by the September 2001 terrorist attacks on the United States and the ensuing enlistment of Pakistan as a pivotal ally in U.S.-led counterterrorism efforts. A small trickle of foreign assistance to Pakistan again became a prodigious flow and, in a sign of renewed U.S. recognition of the country’s importance, President George W. Bush designated Pakistan as a major non-NATO ally of the United States in 2004. A Congressional Pakistan Caucus was formed the same year to facilitate dialogue among Pakistani-Americans and their political representatives in Congress, and to improve and strengthen bilateral relations between Pakistan and the United States.

Today, U.S. diplomatic engagement with Pakistan continues to be deep and multifaceted. President Bush traveled to Pakistan in March 2006 for the first such presidential visit in six years, and numerous high-level governmental meetings have ensued. During the visit, President Bush and President Musharraf issued a Joint Statement on the U.S.-Pakistan “strategic partnership” that calls for a “strategic dialogue” and “significant expansion” of bilateral economic ties in numerous areas.¹³⁸

Political Setting¹³⁹

Pakistan’s political history is a troubled one, marked by tripartite power struggles among presidents, prime ministers, and army chiefs. Military regimes have ruled Pakistan for more than half of its 61 years of existence, interspersed with periods of generally weak civilian governance.¹⁴⁰ From 1988 to 1999, Islamabad had democratically elected governments, and the ¹³⁶ See “President’s Address at Royal United Services Institute, London,” January 25, 2008, at <http://www.presidentofpakistan.gov.pk/SpeechAddressList.aspx>.

¹³⁷ See <http://www.pid.gov.pk/preungen.assemblyadd.htm>.

¹³⁸ See <http://usembassy.state.gov/pakistan/h06030404.html>.

¹³⁹ See also “Democracy and Governance” section below.

¹⁴⁰ See also CRS Report RL32615, Pakistan’s Domestic Political Developments.

army appeared to have moved from its traditional role of “kingmaker” to one of power broker. Benazir Bhutto (leader of the Pakistan People’s Party) and Nawaz Sharif (leader of the Pakistan Muslim League) each served twice as prime minister during this period. The Bhutto government was dismissed on charges of corruption and nepotism in 1996, and Sharif won a landslide victory in ensuing elections, which were judged generally free and fair by international observers. Sharif moved quickly to bolster his powers by curtailing those of the president and judiciary, and he emerged as one of Pakistan’s strongest-ever elected leaders. Critics accused him of intimidating the opposition and the press (in fact, many observers hold Pakistan’s civilian political leaders at least as responsible as the army for the anemic state of the country’s governance institutions).

Musharraf’s 1999 Coup d’Etat

In October 1999, in proximate response to Prime Minister Sharif’s attempt to remove him, Chief of Army Staff Gen. Pervez Musharraf overthrew the government, dismissed the National Assembly, and appointed himself “chief executive.” In the wake of this military overthrow of the elected government, Islamabad faced considerable international opprobrium and was subjected to automatic coup-related U.S. sanctions under Section 508 of the annual foreign assistance appropriations act (Pakistan was already under nuclear-related U.S. sanctions). Musharraf later assumed the title of president following a controversial April 2002 referendum. National elections were held in October of that year, as ordered by the Supreme Court. A new civilian government was seated—Prime Minister M.Z. Jamali was replaced with Musharraf ally Shaukat Aziz in August 2005—but it remained weak. In contravention of democratic norms, Musharraf continued to hold the dual offices of president and army chief. Many figures across the spectrum of Pakistani society at first welcomed Musharraf, or at least were willing to give him the benefit of the doubt, as a potential reformer who would curtail corruption and the influence of religious extremists. Yet his domestic popularity suffered following numerous indications that, as with Pakistan’s previous president-generals, expanding his own power and that of the military would be his central goal.

In September 2007, President Musharraf promoted Gen. Ashfaq Pervez Kayani, a highly-regarded, ostensibly pro-Western figure, to the position of Vice Chief of Army Staff. Kayani then succeeded Musharraf in the powerful role of army chief upon Musharraf’s subsequent resignation from the army. In assuming his new office, Kayani vowed to press ahead with Pakistan army efforts to root out extremists from western Pakistan. He appeared to become a new locus of U.S. hopes for Pakistani democratization, with U.S. officials reportedly seeing an opportunity for him to manage a peaceful transition to civilian rule while maintaining a disinterest in pursuing his own political power.¹⁴¹

The 2008 Democratic Revival

President Bush had predicted that Pakistan’s long-anticipated polls, originally slated for late 2007, would be “an important test of Pakistan’s commitment to democratic reform” and, during his 2006 visit to Islamabad, said President Musharraf understood the elections “need to be open and honest.” Secretary of State Rice repeated the admonition in late 2007, saying the expected polls would be “a real test” of the Islamabad government’s commitment to democratization and that the U.S. government was “pressing that case very hard.” The Chairman of the Senate Foreign ¹⁴¹ “In Musharraf’s Shadow, a New Hope for Pakistan Arises,” New York Times, January 7, 2008.

Relations Committee, Senator Joe Biden, later warned Musharraf there would be “consequences” if slated elections were not fair and open, saying U.S. aid levels could be decreased.¹⁴² Musharraf himself stood for—and controversially won—reelection as president in October 2007 (under the Pakistani system, the president is indirectly elected by an Electoral College comprised of the membership of all national and provincial legislatures).

In February 2008, Pakistan held elections to seat a new National Assembly and all four provincial assemblies. Analysts had foreseen a process entailing rampant political-related violence and electoral rigging in favor of the incumbent, Musharraf-friendly Pakistan Muslim League-Q (PML-Q) faction. Despite weeks of bloodshed leading up to the polls, the day itself was surprisingly calm. Moreover, fears of large-scale rigging were proven unfounded, as the PML-Q was swept from power in a considerable wave of support for Pakistan’s two leading opposition parties, the Pakistan People’s Party (PPP), now overseen by Benazir Bhutto’s widower, Asif Zardari, and the Pakistan Muslim League-Nawaz (PML-N) of former Prime Minister Nawaz Sharif. The two largely secular, moderate parties proceeded to form a ruling parliamentary coalition in Islamabad, and also took charge of coalition governments in the two most populous of the country’s four provinces.

As a perceived referendum on President Musharraf’s rule, the polls reflected a widespread popular rejection of his policies. They also forwarded arguments that the Pakistani populace supports moderate political parties without explicitly religious manifestos. At the same time, the results were seen by many analysts as compounding difficulties for U.S. policy makers who may have placed too much faith in the person of Musharraf, an increasingly isolated figure whose already damaged status was further weakened.

Election Results and Coalition Politics

The 2008 elections saw the PPP win a clear plurality of seats (121 of 342) in the National Assembly. The PML-N of Nawaz Sharif took another 91 seats. The incumbent PML-Q won only 54. This outcome provided the country’s two main secular opposition parties with a near two-thirds majority. They were joined in a new national ruling coalition by the secular Pashtun nationalist Awami National Party (ANP) and the Islamist Jamiat Ulema-i-Islam faction of Fazl-ur-Rehman (JUI-F), both of which find their main strength in the Pashtun-majority North West Frontier Province (NWFP). The PPP also won an outright majority in the provincial parliament of Sindh, the Bhuttos’ ancestral homeland, but still moved to form a ruling provincial coalition with the regional Muttahida Quami Movement (MQM), which dominates Karachi’s political landscape. In the wealthy and densely populated Punjab province, Sharif’s PML-N thrashed the PML-Q in their heartland to take nearly half the provincial assembly seats. Sharif’s brother Shabaz is serving again as Punjab chief minister, overseeing a coalition with the PPP. Voters in the NWFP roundly rejected the previously incumbent Islamist coalition and awarded the ANP a resounding comeback after its virtual shutout in 2002. The PPP and ANP agreed to share power in the NWFP, with the chief minister and most cabinet ministers coming from the ANP. Only in sparsely populated Baluchistan did the PML-Q win a plurality of seats, but the Quetta-based assembly is managed by a grand alliance under a PPP chief minister.

¹⁴² See <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/02/20060222-2.html> and <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/03/20060304-2.html>; Rice interview with the New York Post editorial board, October 1, 2007; “Biden Warns Musharraf of Consequences for Poor Elections,” Associated Press, December 17, 2007.

Musharraf's post-election status. Following the election of an opposition alliance, President Musharraf rejected repeated calls for his resignation and claimed to maintain the support of the powerful army. He expressed a willingness to work with the new Parliament, even as he recognized the potential for a two-thirds opposition majority to reverse many of the changes made during his rule. Such a super-majority could even have moved to impeach him, but for months the PPP put a damper on impeachment talk and instead appeared to seek a “dignified exit” for the embattled Musharraf. Although the Pakistani president’s power and status were much eroded, he remained a potent political player in Islamabad, given especially his lingering support from the military and from some foreign governments, including the United States. Many observers suspected Musharraf engaged in behind-the-scenes efforts to weaken the new civilian coalition with a special eye toward marginalizing Nawaz Sharif and the PML-N.¹⁴³

Coalition building and government formation. In March 2008, PPP leader Zardari and PML-N leader Sharif issued a written declaration of their intention to share power at the center (along with the ANP) under a PPP Prime Minister and in the Punjab under a PML-N Chief Minister.¹⁴⁴ In a major show of opposition unity, the accord notably vowed to seek restoration of deposed judges to office within 30 days of the new government’s seating. Many viewed this “Murree Declaration” as an historic rejection of military-bureaucratic rule in Islamabad. Sindhi businesswoman Fahimda Mirza—a PPP stalwart and close associate of Zardari—became Pakistan’s first-ever female National Assembly Speaker.

Zardari announced the prime ministerial candidacy of Yousaf Raza Gillani, a party stalwart from the Punjab province. Gillani was National Assembly Speaker during Benazir Bhutto’s second government (1993-1996) and spent five years in prison (2001-2006) after being sentenced by an anti-corruption court created under President Musharraf.¹⁴⁵ On March 24, Gillani became Pakistan’s 22nd Prime Minister. Of his 24 cabinet ministers, 11 were from the PPP and 9 from the PML-N. Important new federal ministers include Foreign Minister Shah Mehmood Qureshi, who hails from a land-owning family in southern Punjabi city of Multan and has been a PPP lawmaker since 1985, serving as a Punjab provincial minister during the 1990s; and Defense Minister Chaudhry Ahmed Mukhtar, an industrialist from the Gujrat region of Punjab, who served as federal commerce minister in Benazir Bhutto’s second government and who won his parliamentary seat in 2008 by defeating PML-Q leader Chaudhry Shujaat Hussein.

Coalition politics. Never before in Pakistan’s history had the country’s two leading political parties come together to share power. While many observers praised the Murree Declaration as representing a potentially new conciliatory style of party politics, others noted that the PPP and PML-N spent most of the 1990s as bitter enemies. The history of mutual party animosity in fact dates to 1972, when Benazir’s father, Prime Minister Zulfikar Ali Bhutto, nationalized industries owned by Nawaz Sharif’s father.¹⁴⁶ Opposition to Musharraf’s continued power united these parties for a time, but with Musharraf fanning the flames of party competition—and with his possibly imminent departure from power removing the key unifying factor between them—analysts were pessimistic that an accommodation could last.

¹⁴³ “Sidelined Musharraf Still Exerts Influence,” Washington Post, May 18, 2008.

¹⁴⁴ Declaration text available at <http://thenews.jang.com.pk/updates.asp?id=39768>.

¹⁴⁵ Musharraf’s opponents say the court was established as a means of intimidating and coercing politicians to join the PML-Q, which Gillani had refused to do (“Profile: Yusuf Raza Gillani,” BBC News, March 23, 2008).

¹⁴⁶ “Decades of Enmity Threaten Pakistani Coalition, Say Analysts,” Agence France -Presse, February 22, 2008.

In May 2008, Zardari announced that a constitutional reforms package had been completed, saying this proposed “18th Amendment” would reverse changes to the constitution made under Musharraf and so “walk [Musharraf] away rather than impeach him away.” The PPP transmitted to the PML-N an 80-point draft proposal that would restore the deposed judges while greatly reducing the power of the presidency. Proposed amendments would, inter alia, remove the president’s powers to declare war, dismiss the Parliament, and appoint governors and military service chiefs. The bill faced a lengthy period of assessment before legislative action was expected. Critics of the bill decried its alleged indemnification of President Musharraf’s November 2007 actions and in its provisions that could make the Pakistani judiciary subordinate to the executive. In June, Zardari and Sharif met to create a consensus on outstanding issues, including the judges’ restoration and the possible impeachment of the president, but no breakthroughs were announced. Sharif reportedly refused to see his party lieutenants rejoin the federal cabinet until the judicial benches were restored through executive order (see below). Still, both leaders vowed to keep the coalition intact.

Restoration of Deposed Judges

During the six-week-long state of emergency launched by President Musharraf on November 3, 2007, seven Supreme Court justices, including the Chief Justice, and about 56 High Court judges refused to take a new oath of office and were dismissed. The Supreme Court was then reconstituted with justices appointed by Musharraf himself. The question of whether and how to restore the Chief Justice and other deposed judges remained a key divisive issue. In declaring an intention to restore the pre-November 3 Supreme Court, the new civilian dispensation appeared to set itself on a collision course with Musharraf. Reseating that court likely would have led to Musharraf’s removal from office, as the justices had appeared close to finding his October reelection unconstitutional. Many Pakistanis suspect the U.S. government of hindering restoration efforts. Asif Zardari has sought to assure those agitating for the judges’ reinstatement that restoration would come “in due course of time,” but that other political variables dictate patience in this regard. Nawaz Sharif himself accused the U.S. government of actively discouraging such restoration.¹⁴⁷ Many observers argue that respect for judicial independence is a key requirement for sustaining and strengthening Pakistan’s democratic transition.¹⁴⁸

Pakistan’s federal law minister has stated that, because Musharraf’s November 2007 actions were validated by the Supreme Court, only that court can undo the changes. In late August 2008, eight judges who had been sacked from the Sindh High Court took a new oath of office and were reappointed in a move criticized by the leader of the “lawyer’s movement,” who said the action implicitly accepted their original removal as having been constitutional. Shortly after, three deposed Supreme Court justices were reinstated after taking a new oath. The PPP leadership continues to vow that all sacked judges will be restored, but they do not provide a deadline for such reinstatement. Pakistani cynics see Zardari behaving similarly to Musharraf in his efforts to prevent a truly independent judiciary from taking shape.¹⁴⁹

¹⁴⁷ “Judges Not Being Restored Due to American Pressure: APDM,” News (Karachi), June 19, 2008; “Hold Your Horses, Zardari Tells Lawyers,” News (Karachi), May 24, 2008; “Pakistan TV Show Discusses Judges’ Restoration Issue,” BBC Monitoring South Asia, March 18, 2008.

¹⁴⁸ See, for example, “Reforming the Judiciary in Pakistan,” International Crisis Group Asia Report 160, October 16, 2008.

¹⁴⁹ “Nov 3 Actions Cannot Be Undone: Naek,” News (Karachi), August 28, 2008; “Aitzaz Deplores Oath By Eight SHC Judges,” Daily Times (Lahore), August 28, 2008; “Resignations of PML-N Ministers Will Be Accepted Soon: (continued...)”

The “Lawyers’ Movement.” The “lawyer’s movement” that arose in response to Musharraf’s March 2007 dismissal of Chief Justice Iftikhar Chaudhry (who was reelected in July of that year and dismissed again in the November emergency) was a vital facet of the pro-rule of law, anti-Musharraf sentiment that spread in Pakistan during 2007. It has not faded away: lawyers continue to boycott many courts and the movement remains able to mobilize significant street protests, which Chaudhry continues to publicly support. Aitzaz Ahsan, the Supreme Court Bar Association president and PPP Senator who led the successful effort to have Chaudhry reelected in mid-2007, has been at the forefront of efforts to restore the pre-emergency judiciary.¹⁵⁰ His subsequent detention attracted the attention of some in the U.S. Congress, who called for his immediate release. Ahsan has criticized Washington for callousness regarding Musharraf’s crackdown on the Supreme Court, claiming that U.S. policy is “deaf and oblivious” to the voice of ordinary Pakistanis.¹⁵¹

Coalition discord. The original April 30, 2008, deadline for the judge’s restoration passed without action. Despite Sharif’s apparent optimism that a resolution would be reached, subsequent meetings with Zardari in London again failed to break the deadlock. In mid-May, Sharif announced that his party would withdraw from its seats in the federal cabinet while still supporting the PPP-led national coalition on an “issue by issue basis.” Nine PML-N ministers subsequently handed in resignations. A legal advisor to Sharif reportedly held the Bush Administration partly responsible for the negotiation’s breakdown, given an alleged U.S. concern that President Musharraf be “protected” and allowed a “safe exit” sometime near the end of 2008. His claims reflected widely held suspicions among Pakistanis about U.S. “meddling” in their country’s coalition politics.¹⁵² In a July visit to Islamabad, the lead U.S. diplomat for South and Central Asia urged Pakistan’s political leaders to concentrate their energies on addressing critical issues such as religious militancy, rising food costs, and energy shortages rather than fixating on efforts to remove President Musharraf. Sharif was said to have flatly rejected the advice, countering that Musharraf’s impeachment was a necessary step toward consolidation of the country’s democratization.¹⁵³

Impeachment Plans and Musharraf’s Resignation

On August 5, 2008, PPP leader Asif Zardari and PML-N leader Nawaz Sharif agreed in principle to seek the impeachment of President Musharraf. Three days later, the four-party ruling coalition said it would launch impeachment proceedings “immediately” (under Pakistan’s Constitution, impeachment of the president requires a two-thirds majority vote by the combined 442-seat membership of Parliament’s two chambers.) Musharraf’s aides vowed that the president would

(...continued)

PM,” Daily Times (Lahore), August 30, 2008; Asif Edzi, “In Musharraf’s Footsteps” (op-ed), News (Karachi), October 30, 2008.

¹⁵⁰ See “The Lawyers’ Crusade,” New York Times, June 1, 2008.

¹⁵¹ “Civil Rights Activist Criticizes U.S. as ‘Oblivious’” (interview), Washington Times, July 3, 2008. See also, Aitzaz Ahsan, “Pakistan’s Tyranny Continues” (op-ed), New York Times, December 23, 2007. When asked during a Senate hearing about the status of judges dismissed under Musharraf’s emergency proclamation, Deputy Secretary of State John Negroponte conceded that the U.S. government had “been silent on the subject” (“Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. Holds a Hearing on U.S. Policy Options in Post-Election Pakistan,” CQ Transcripts, February 28, 2008).

¹⁵² “Coalition Partner Leaves Pakistan’s Cabinet in Dispute Over Reinstating Judges,” New York Times, May 13, 2008.

¹⁵³ See <http://www.state.gov/p/sca/rls/2008/106495.htm>; “Leave Musharraf Alone, Boucher Tells Nawaz,” Daily Times (Lahore), July 2, 2008.

fight the effort, but some former political allies began urging Musharraf to resign rather than further polarize the country. Prime Minister Gillani expressed confidence that the military leadership was pro-democracy and would not intervene to protect Musharraf.¹⁵⁴ Cynical observers saw the two major party leaders valuing their own political fortunes over the health of the Pakistani nation. Such cynicism only deepened with the later news that Zardari would present himself as candidate to be Pakistan's next president.¹⁵⁵

The first major aspect of the federal coalition's plan to remove the president involved passing anti-Musharraf resolutions in each of the country's four provincial assemblies. The Punjab assembly overwhelmingly passed the first such resolution; the NWFP, Sindh, and Baluchistan assemblies followed within days. With signs that the military brass would not come to his aid, the besieged president appeared to have no allies remaining, and a flood of reports indicated that Musharraf's resignation was imminent.¹⁵⁶ On August 18, President Musharraf delivered a resignation address to the nation in which he claimed responsibility both for turning around Pakistan's economy and for introducing the "essence of democracy" there. He blamed the new civilian government for the country's current economic and political instability, rejected the "charge sheet" that had been brought against him, explained his decision to resign as an effort to avoid confrontation and further instability, and placed his fate in the hands of the Pakistani people.¹⁵⁷

Coalition Collapse and PPP Consolidation

Almost instantly upon Musharraf's resignation, serious rifts again appeared in the ruling coalition, with Nawaz Sharif reportedly delivering an ultimatum to the PPP that the Chief Justice be restored to office within 72 hours or the PML-N would withdraw support. Moreover, the PPP's announcement that Zardari himself would be a candidate for the presidency violated Sharif's understanding that the new president would be a nonpolitical figure.¹⁵⁸ On August 25, Sharif responded to what he saw as a series of broken promises by withdrawing his party's support for the ruling coalition and joining the opposition benches in Parliament. The end of the five-month-long accommodation between the PPP and PML-N did not lead to new elections, as Zardari's party collected enough smaller party support to remain in power. Yet the development triggered a wide array of analysts to predict even more political instability in Islamabad in the foreseeable future, and the fractiousness of Pakistan's governance setting cast a further pall over prospects for the country's new civilian leadership to deal effectively with Pakistan's urgent economic and security problems.¹⁵⁹

¹⁵⁴ "Allies Call on Beleaguered Musharraf to Quit," Reuters, August 10, 2008; "Pakistan Army Won't Support Musharraf - Government," Reuters, August 12, 2008.

¹⁵⁵ See, for example, "M.B. Naqvi, "While Rome Burns, Plain Words" (op-ed), News (Karachi), August 6, 2008; S. Sathanathan, "Retrieving Democracy?" (op-ed), Outlook (Delhi), August 12, 2008; "The Zardari Card" (editorial), News (Karachi), August 22, 2008.

¹⁵⁶ "Military Cuts Power From Under Musharraf," Financial Times (London), August 13, 2008; "Musharraf Expected to Resign Within Days," New York Times, August 15, 2008.

¹⁵⁷ "Going, Going, Gone!," Daily Times, (Lahore), August 19, 2008. Speech text at http://www.cfr.org/publication/16999/president_musharrafs_resignation_speech.html?breadcrumb=%2Fregion%2F279%2Fsouth_asia.

¹⁵⁸ "Interview With Nawaz Sharif," Wall Street Journal, August 21, 2008.

¹⁵⁹ "Fractious Coalition in Pakistan Breaks Apart," New York Times, August 25, 2008; "Pakistani Stability Hope Fades With Coalition Split," Reuters, August 26, 2008; Moed Yusuf, "Back to the Past" (op-ed), Friday Times (Lahore), August 29, 2008.

Asif Zardari's candidacy to replace Musharraf suggested that the presidency's constitutional powers will not be amended in the foreseeable future. With support from the influential regional MQM party based in Karachi, Zardari won the September 6 presidential election with 481 out of 702 votes in the electoral college. Allegations of corruption still haunt Zardari, and reports arose that cast doubt on his recent mental health.¹⁶⁰ Zardari's controversial record led many analysts to decry his candidacy as a "disaster" for both Pakistan and its democratic institutions.¹⁶¹ According to some reports, the Pakistani security establishment was dead-set against a Zardari presidency and put its full weight behind the PML-N candidate.¹⁶²

Zardari himself posed the presidential election as a culmination of his assassinated wife's efforts, and he vowed to "bring back into balance the powers of the presidency," reconstitute judicial independence through the reinstatement of judges deposed by Musharraf, and carry on the fight against Taliban and other religious extremists.¹⁶³ In his inaugural speech, Zardari called for an all-parties committee to "revisit" the 17th Amendment and Article 58(2)b of the Constitution, which gives the President the power to dismiss Parliament. Prime Minister Gillani has said his government is committed to revoking the article.¹⁶⁴

Confidence in the new president has been harmed by seemingly worsening security and economic crises, leaving both ordinary Pakistanis and foreign diplomats uneasy about the new government's capacity. Still, Secretary of State Rice expressed being "impressed" with some of Zardari's comments on Pakistan's need to fight terrorism and said she looked forward to working with him. Zardari emphatically declares that "the war on terror is Pakistan's war" and asserts that, as a grieving husband who lost his wife to terrorism, his commitment to the fight is both national and personal. In a thinly veiled response to U.S. pressure, he wrote, "We do not need lectures about terrorism from anyone.... We live it each and every day." He calls for international support for Pakistani democracy and economic viability, saying "a secure Pakistan is the greatest asset in the world's fight against terrorism."¹⁶⁵

Role of the Pakistani Military

The army's role as a dominant and overt political player in Pakistan may be changing. Following President Musharraf's November resignation as army chief, the new leadership showed signs of distancing itself from both Musharraf and from direct involvement in the country's governance. The president's handpicked successor, Gen. Kayani, has issued orders barring officers from ¹⁶⁰ "Numbers Game Tilts in Favor of People's Party," Daily Times (Lahore), August 22, 2008; "Zardari on the Hot Seat," Newsweek (online), August 20, 2008; "Battle Scars On Show as Zardari in Spotlight," Financial Times (London), August 25, 2008.

¹⁶¹ "Pakistan's Next President is a Category 5 Disaster" (op-ed), Wall Street Journal; "Bhutto's Homeland Has Little Love for Zardari," Agence France Presse, both September 2, 2008; "bhutto Widower With Clouded Past is Poised to Lead Pakistan," New York Times, September 5, 2008.

¹⁶² See, for example, "Establishment Determined to Stop Zardari to Become President," Business Recorder (Karachi), August 30, 2008.

¹⁶³ Asif Ali Zardari, "Democracy Within Our Reach" (op-ed), Washington Post, September 4, 2008.

¹⁶⁴ See <http://www.pid.gov.pk/Final%20Speech%20of%20President.doc>; "Government to Revoke Article 58(2)b: Gillani," News (Karachi), September 7, 2008.

¹⁶⁵ "Terrorism Fears and Economic Trouble Shake Pakistan's Faith in New Leader," New York Times, September 27, 2008; "Is Pakistan's New Leader Up to the Job?," Los Angeles Times, September 29, 2008; <http://www.state.gov/secretary/rm/2008/09/109229.htm>; Asif Ali Zardari, "Pakistan Will Prevail Against Terrorism" (op-ed), Boston Globe, September 25, 2008.

holding unauthorized meetings with civilian leaders; dictated that all active officers holding posts in civilian agencies resign from those positions; and announced that the military's only role in the electoral process would be maintenance of security. He later called for a "harmonized relationship between various pillars of state, as provided in the Constitution." In March 2008, Kayani exerted further influence by making his first major new appointments, replacing two of the nine corps commanders appointed by Musharraf. Many analysts see Gen. Kayani as motivated to improve the image of the military as an institution after a serious erosion of its status under Musharraf. His dictates and rhetoric have brought accolades from numerous commentators.¹⁶⁶ According to Pakistan's envoy to the United States, the country's "national consensus on democracy" is fully supported by the Pakistani military, which is "scrupulously" avoiding any overt or covert role in the country's politics.¹⁶⁷

U.S. Policy

Pakistan's relatively credible 2008 polls allowed the Bush Administration to issue a determination that a democratically elected government had been restored in Islamabad after a 101-month hiatus. This permanently removed coup-related aid sanctions that President Bush had been authorized to waive annually.¹⁶⁸ The U.S. government recognizes Pakistan's 2008 political shift as a renewed opportunity to assist in efforts to consolidate the country's democratic institutions. Both before and after the elections, U.S. officials expounded a desire to see "moderate forces" within Pakistani politics come together to sustain their country's political and economic reforms and to carry on the fight against religious extremism and terrorism. The White House anticipates Pakistan's continued cooperation in this regard.¹⁶⁹

After meeting with myriad Pakistani officials Islamabad in March 2008, Deputy Secretary of State Negroponte said the U.S.-Pakistan partnership "remains strong" and "we envision a continued close, productive alliance that benefits both countries." He insisted that the United States "is committed to working with all of Pakistan's leaders on the full spectrum of bilateral issues" and "will continue to help the Pakistani people build a secure, prosperous, and free society."¹⁷⁰ By some accounts, however, the U.S. government has sought and may continue seeking to influence Islamabad's internal political processes. Most Pakistanis expressed a keen sensitivity to signs of U.S. attempts to influence the post-election coalition-building negotiations. Some observers suspect the Bush Administration remained wedded to a policy that would have kept the embattled Musharraf in power despite his weakness and lack of public support.¹⁷¹ During June 2008, speculation was rife in Pakistan that the United States was steering the PPP

¹⁶⁶ "Pakistan Military Retreats From Musharraf's Influence," McClatchy Newspapers, January 18, 2008; "Army Chief Urges Harmony Among Pakistan's Leaders," Reuters, March 6, 2008; "Quiet General Tries to Keep Army Out of Politics," Wall Street Journal, August 22, 2008.

¹⁶⁷ Remarks by Ambassador Husain Haqqani at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, Washington, D.C., August 20, 2008.

¹⁶⁸ Federal Register 73, 69, p. 19276-19277, April 9, 2008.

¹⁶⁹ See <http://www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/afdr/2008/104862.htm> and <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2008/03/20080325-3.html>.

¹⁷⁰ See http://islamabad.usembassy.gov/pr_03272008.html.

¹⁷¹ See, for example, "Pressure on Asif, Nawaz to Work With President," Dawn (Karachi), February 23, 2008; M.B. Naqvi, "Untangling the Web of Intrigues" (op-ed), News (Karachi), April 16, 2008.

leadership toward implementing whatever agreements were made between Benazir Bhutto and Musharraf in 2007.¹⁷²

Still, senior Bush Administration officials appeared to be recognizing the importance of a broader array of political figures in Islamabad. In what was taken to be a clear indication of shifting U.S. policy, visiting Deputy Secretary of State Negroponte—who had in late 2007 described the Pakistani president as an “indispensable ally” of the United States—offered little public defense of Musharraf in early 2008, calling his future status a matter to be determined by “the internal Pakistani political process.”¹⁷³ When asked about the coalition’s intention to proceed with impeachment in August, a State Department spokesman said, “We have consistently said the internal politics of Pakistan is an issue for the Pakistani people to decide. Our expectation is that any action will be consistent with the rule of law and the Pakistani constitution.” The White House also said Pakistanis themselves must determine the outcome.¹⁷⁴

By removing the single most important interlocutor in Islamabad, Musharraf’s resignation presented yet another challenge for U.S. officials in their dealings with Pakistan. Despite the Bush Administration’s official noninterference posture, many reports had the U.S. government urging a “soft landing” for Musharraf. Still, in the end, the Bush Administration watched quietly as its key Pakistani ally was marginalized, apparently concluding that Musharraf’s time was up and that any further overt U.S. support for the discredited ex-general would only stoke visceral anti-American sentiments in Pakistan.¹⁷⁵ Upon Musharraf’s resignation, Secretary of State Rice admitted Pakistan is going through “a difficult and fragile time,” but she rejected the notion that there is any leadership vacuum there. Rice issued a statement of strong and ongoing support for Pakistan’s democratic government, and she expressed “deep gratitude” for Musharraf’s role as “one of the world’s most committed partners in the war against terrorism and extremism. The White House voiced confidence that Islamabad would continue in that effort. Both major party U.S. presidential candidates welcomed Musharraf’s exit as a step toward ending Pakistan’s political crisis.¹⁷⁶

¹⁷² See, for example, “Pakistan TV Show Discusses Continuing US, Army Support for Musharraf,” and “Pakistan TV Show Discusses US Government’s Continuing Support to Musharraf,” BBC Monitoring South Asia, June 1, 2008, and June 6, 2008, respectively.

¹⁷³ “Press Statement - Deputy Secretary John Negroponte,” U.S. Embassy Press Release, March 27, 2008; “US Says No Meddling to Save Musharraf,” Associated Press, March 27, 2008; “US Offers Support for Pakistan’s Parties,” Associated Press, March 11, 2008.

¹⁷⁴ See <http://www.state.gov/r/pa/prs/dpb/2008/aug/107990.htm>; “US Cautious Amid Musharraf Resignation Reports,” Agence France Presse, August 15, 2008.

¹⁷⁵ “US Wants ‘Honorable’ Stay for President of Pakistan,” Dawn (Karachi), August 11, 2008; “As Musharraf Faltered, U.S. Stayed at a Distance,” Washington Post, August 19, 2008; “How Bush Was Persuaded to Let Musharraf Go,” Dawn (Karachi), August 19, 2008.

¹⁷⁶ Secretary Condoleezza Rice, “Remarks En Route to Brussels, Belgium,” August 18, 2008; <http://islamabad.usembassy.gov/pr-08081801.html>; <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2008/08/20080818-1.html>; “McCain, Obama Welcome Musharraf Resignation,” Agence France Presse, August 18, 2008; “Analysis - Pakistani Security Policy Set to Follow Musharraf,” Reuters, August 19, 2008.

Regional Relations

Pakistan-India Rivalry

Three full-scale wars—in 1947-1948, 1965, and 1971—and a constant state of military preparedness on both sides of their mutual border have marked six decades of bitter rivalry between Pakistan and India. The acrimonious partition of British India into two successor states in 1947 and the unresolved issue of Kashmiri sovereignty have been major sources of tension. Both countries have built large defense establishments at significant cost to economic and social development. The Kashmir problem is rooted in claims by both countries to the former princely state, divided since 1948 by a military Line of Control (LOC) into the Indian state of Jammu and Kashmir and Pakistan-held Azad [Free] Kashmir. India blames Pakistan for supporting a violent separatist rebellion in the Muslim-dominated Kashmir Valley that has taken up to 66,000 lives since 1989. Pakistan admits only to lending moral and political support to the rebels, and it criticizes India for human rights abuses in “Indian-occupied Kashmir.” New Delhi continues to blame Pakistan for maintaining an “infrastructure of terror” and for actively supporting terrorist groups that are held responsible for attacks inside India.¹⁷⁷ For many analysts, efforts to ameliorate Pakistan’s “obsession” with India could be key to normalizing South Asian politics and ending Islamabad’s historic and ambivalent links to religious extremism.¹⁷⁸ Some call on New Delhi to reach out to the new Islamabad government with conciliatory gestures that could facilitate the consolidation of democratization in Pakistan.¹⁷⁹

India held Pakistan responsible for late 2001 terrorist attacks in Kashmir and on the Indian Parliament complex in New Delhi. The Indian response, a massive military mobilization, was mirrored by Pakistan and within months some one million heavily-armed soldiers were facing off at the international frontier. During an extremely tense 2002 another full-scale war seemed a real and even likely possibility, and may have been averted only through international diplomatic efforts, including multiple visits to the region by top U.S. officials. A spring 2003 peace initiative brought major improvement in the bilateral relationship, allowing for an autumn cease-fire agreement initiated by Pakistan. The process led to a January 2004 summit meeting in Islamabad and a joint agreement to re-engage a “Composite Dialogue” to bring about “peaceful settlement of all bilateral issues, including Jammu and Kashmir, to the satisfaction of both sides.”¹⁸⁰

Since this new peace effort was launched, numerous mid-level meetings, normalized diplomatic relations, and increased people-to-people contacts have brought modest, but still meaningful progress toward stable relations. Regular dialogue continued in 2005 and a third round of Composite Dialogue talks was held in 2006. Notable confidence-building measures have been put in place, in particular travel and commerce across the Kashmiri LOC for the first time in decades, and bilateral trade has increased. Yet militarized territorial disputes over Kashmir, the Siachen Glacier, and the Sir Creek remain unresolved, and Pakistani officials regularly express

¹⁷⁷ While levels of violence in Kashmir declined significantly in 2007 as compared to the previous year, some Indian analysts see signs that Islamist militants will seek to reverse this trend, perhaps with the urging and even support of Pakistani government elements (see, for example, “Negotiating War,” Outlook (Delhi), May 28, 2008).

¹⁷⁸ See, for example, Bruce Riedel, “Pakistan and Terror: The Eye of the Storm,” Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, 618, 31 July 2008.

¹⁷⁹ See, for example, Praful Bidwai, “Changing Pakistan,” Frontline (Chennai), July 4, 2008.

¹⁸⁰ http://www.indianembassy.org/press_release/2004/jan/07.htm.

unhappiness that more substantive progress, especially on the “core issue” of Kashmir, is not occurring.

Following July 11, 2006, terrorist bombings in Mumbai, India, New Delhi postponed planned foreign secretary-level talks, bringing into question the continued viability of the already slow-moving process. However, after meeting on the sidelines of a Nonaligned Movement summit in Cuba, President Musharraf and Indian Prime Minister Singh announced a resumption of formal peace negotiations and also approved implementation of a joint anti-terrorism mechanism. The Composite Dialogue then resumed after a four-month hiatus. No progress was made on outstanding territorial disputes, and India is not known to have presented evidence of Pakistani involvement in the “7/11” bombings, but the two officials did give shape to the proposed joint anti-terrorism mechanism. A notable step came in late 2006, when the two sides agreed to conduct a joint survey of the disputed Sir Creek region.

In January 2007, Foreign Minister Kasuri hosted his Indian counterpart, Pranab Mukherjee, in Islamabad for the first such visit in more than a year. The two men gave a favorable review to past progress and planned a fourth Composite Dialogue round. In February, two bombs exploded on an Indian segment of the Samjhauta [Friendship] Express train linking Delhi, India, with Lahore, Pakistan. Resulting fires killed 68 people, most of them Pakistanis. Days later, Kasuri traveled to New Delhi, where he and Mukherjee reaffirmed a bilateral commitment to the peace process despite the apparent effort to subvert it.

The new joint anti-terrorism mechanism met for the first time in Islamabad in March 2007, producing a joint statement in which both governments agreed to use the forum for exchanging information about investigations of and/or efforts to prevent terrorist acts on either side of the shared border. Hopes that the Samjhauta train bombing would provide a fitting “test case” were dashed, however, when India declined to share relevant investigative information. Moreover, Indian officials were unhappy with Islamabad’s insistence that the “freedom struggle” underway in Kashmir should not be treated as terrorism under this framework. Still, the engagement even after a major terrorist attack was widely viewed as evidence that the bilateral peace process had gained a sturdy momentum. A new round of dialogue was then initiated when the two foreign ministers met again in Islamabad. No new agreements were reached, but both officials lauded improved bilateral relations and held “the most sustained and intensive dialogue” ever on the Kashmir problem.¹⁸¹ Political turmoil and uncertainty arose in Islamabad around that same time, however, and led to slowed progress in the bilateral peace process.

A fourth round of bilateral talks on economic and commercial cooperation ended in August 2007 with agreements to facilitate importation of cement from Pakistan and tea from India, among others. Pakistani and Indian officials also held technical-level talks on the modalities of cross-border movement, and separate talks on the Tubal navigation project/Wullar barrage water dispute ended without progress. In September, Pakistan issued a formal protest and expressed “deep concern” in response to the Indian government’s announced intention to open the disputed territory of the Siachen Glacier to tourism, saying the region was “illegally occupied” by Indian troops in 1984 and its final status has yet to be determined due to an “inflexible Indian attitude.”¹⁸² In a more positive sign in October, trucks carrying tomatoes from India to Pakistan crossed the international border for the first time in 60 years. October also saw mid-level Pakistani and Indian officials meet to discuss both conventional and nuclear confidence-building measures, but no new initiatives were announced. The countries also held a second meeting of their Joint Anti-Terrorism Mechanism in New Delhi, where the two sides shared new information on terrorism and agreed to continue mutual investigatory cooperation.

¹⁸¹ See Pakistan Foreign Ministry Press Release No. 81/2007 at http://www.mofa.gov.pk/Press_Releases/2007/March/PR_81_07.htm.

¹⁸² See http://www.mofa.gov.pk/Spokesperson/2007/Sep/Spokes_17_09_07.htm.

With President Musharraf's November 2007 imposition of a state of emergency and growing instability and insecurity in Pakistan, the bilateral peace process ground to a seemingly temporary halt. India has watched Pakistan's turmoil with great interest, but little public comment. A destabilized Pakistan represents a major security concern for New Delhi, but at the same time history shows that as Pakistan's internal difficulties grow, Pakistani interference in Indian affairs tends to decrease. Moreover, interstate relations may be sufficiently improved and "de-hyphenated" that acute Indian concerns shown in the past are no longer elicited.¹⁸³

In February 2008, the head of Pakistan's new coalition-leading PPP, Asif Zardari, caused a stir when he suggested that Pakistan-India relations should not be hindered by differences over Kashmir, thus appearing to contradict a long-standing Pakistani position that Kashmir represents the "core issue" in bilateral relations. Zardari was quoted as saying, "people-to-people contacts should be improved, then trade" and Kashmir "is a situation [on which] we can agree to disagree." India's leadership, for its part, has offered to work with the new Pakistani government in the interests of collective security and prosperity.¹⁸⁴ In May, Pakistani Foreign Secretary Salman Bashir hosted his Indian counterpart, Shivshankar Menon, in Islamabad, where the two men expressed satisfaction with the progress of the bilateral peace process. The next day, Foreign Minister Qureshi sat with his Indian counterpart, Pranab Mukherjee, to review the fourth round of the Composite Dialogue. Both ministers reaffirmed their commitment to the process and a fifth round of negotiations was launched in July 2008.¹⁸⁵

The "IPI" Pipeline Project¹⁸⁶

Islamabad insists it is going forward with a proposed joint pipeline project to deliver Iranian natural gas to Pakistan and possibly on to India. In early 2007, officials from the three countries resolved a long-running price-mechanism dispute, opening the way for further progress. The fourth meeting of the Pakistan-India Joint Working Group on the Iran-Pakistan-India (IPI) pipeline subsequently was held in Islamabad, where the two countries agreed to split equally expected gas supplies. New Delhi's willingness to participate appeared to wane in the later half of 2007, but an April 2008 visit to Islamabad by India's oil minister led to a reiteration of New Delhi's commitment to the project, and the Iranian president's subsequent South Asia visit included stops in both Islamabad and New Delhi, where more positive signals were issued. Top Pakistani officials have described the pipeline as being critical to Pakistan's economic growth and political stability. Doubts about financing the approximately $7 billion project combined with concerns about security in Pakistan's Baluchistan province have many analysts skeptical about ¹⁸³ "As Pakistan Boils, India Watches," Chicago Tribune, December 30, 2007; "Pakistan Turmoil Draws Muted Concern in India," Washington Post, January 19, 2008; Indian Ministry of External Affairs Press Statement, February 20, 2008.

¹⁸⁴ "Benazir Bhutto's Widower Wants Improved Relations With India," Associated Press, February 29, 2008; "India PM Wants to Meet Pakistan's Leaders Halfway," Reuters, March 5, 2008.

¹⁸⁵ See http://www.mofa.gov.pk/Press_Releases/2008/May/PR_134_08.html.

¹⁸⁶ See also CRS Report RS20871, The Iran Sanctions Act (ISA).

fruition. Some independent observers and Members of Congress assert that completion of the pipeline would represent a major confidence-building measure in the region and could bolster regional energy security while facilitating friendlier Pakistan-India ties (see, for example, H.Res. 353 in the 109th Congress). In late 2008, a group of senior, U.S.-based Pakistan recommended that Washington should reconsider its opposition to the pipeline so as “to encourage better ties and more robust economic linkages between India and Pakistan.”¹⁸⁷

As part of its efforts to isolate Iran economically, the Bush Administration actively seeks to dissuade the Islamabad and New Delhi governments from participation in this project, and a State Department official has suggested that current U.S. law dictates American opposition: The Iran-Libya Sanctions Act (P.L. 107-24) requires the President to impose sanctions on foreign companies that make an “investment” of more than $20 million in one year in Iran’s energy sector. The 109th Congress extended this provision in the Iran Freedom Support Act (P.L. 109-293). No firms have been sanctioned under this act to date.

Afghanistan

Pakistani leaders have long sought access to Central Asia and “strategic depth” with regard to India through friendly relations with neighboring Afghanistan. Such policy contributed to President-General Zia ul-Haq’s support for Afghan mujahideen “freedom fighters” who were battling Soviet invaders during the 1980s and to Islamabad’s later support for the Afghan Taliban regime from 1996 to 2001.¹⁸⁸ British colonialists had purposely divided the ethnic Pashtun tribes inhabiting the mountainous northwestern reaches of their South Asian empire with the 1893 “Durand Line.” This porous, 1,600-mile border is not accepted by Afghan leaders, who have at times fanned Pashtun nationalism to the dismay of Pakistanis.¹⁸⁹ Both Pakistan and Afghanistan play central roles as U.S. allies in global efforts to combat Islamic militancy. Ongoing acrimony between Islamabad and Kabul is thus deleterious to U.S. interests.

After fleeing Afghanistan during the 1980s and 1990s, an estimated 3 million refugees have returned home since 2002, but Pakistan remains the setting for more than 80 encampments and about 2.4 million Afghan refugees. Islamabad plans to repatriate these people by the end of 2009, citing extremism and economic stresses.

Following Islamabad’s major September 2001 policy shift, President Musharraf consistently vowed full Pakistani support for the government of Afghan President Hamid Karzai and insisted that Pakistan is playing a “totally neutral role” in Afghanistan. Islamabad claims to have arrested many hundreds of Taliban militants and remanded most of them to Afghan custody, and it reportedly has provided $300 million in economic assistance to Kabul since 2001. Nevertheless, Musharraf and Karzai have exchanged public accusations and recriminations about the ongoing movement of Islamic militants in the border region, and U.S. officials have issued increasingly strong claims about the problems posed by Taliban insurgents and other militants who are widely believed to enjoy safehaven on the Pakistani side of the Durand Line.

¹⁸⁷ See <http://www.cfr.org/content/publications/attachments/PakistanPolicyWorkingGroupReport.pdf>.

¹⁸⁸ Documentary evidence indicates that Islamabad provided military and economic support, perhaps including the combat troops, to the Afghan Taliban during the latter half of the 1990s (see “Pakistan: ‘The Taliban’s Godfather’?,” National Security Archive Briefing Book 227, August 14, 2007).

¹⁸⁹ Pakistan is home to some 28 million Pashto-speaking people, most of them living near the border with Afghanistan, which is home to another 13.5 million ethnic Pashtuns (also known as Pakhtuns or Pathans). A hardy people with a proud martial history (they are disproportionately represented in the Pakistani military), Pashtuns played an important role in the anti-Soviet resistance of the 1980s.

Pakistan is wary of signs that India is pursuing a policy of “strategic encirclement,” taking note of New Delhi’s past support for Tajik and Uzbek militias which comprised the Afghan Northern Alliance, and the post-2001 opening of numerous Indian consulates in Afghanistan. More fundamental, perhaps, than the regime type in Islamabad is the Pakistani geopolitical perspective focused on India as the primary threat and on Afghanistan as an arena of security competition between Islamabad and New Delhi. In the conception of one long-time analyst, “Pakistan’s grand strategy, with an emphasis on balancing against Afghanistan and India, will continue to limit cooperation in the war on terrorism, regardless of whether elected civilian leaders retain power or the military intervenes again.”¹⁹⁰

In August 2007, an unprecedented joint “jirga,” or tribal assembly, was held in Kabul and included nearly 700 delegates from both Pakistan and Afghanistan. The meeting was endorsed by the United States as a means of bringing stability to Afghanistan. President Musharraf, after initially declining to participate (a perceived snub to both Afghan President Karzai and to the U.S. government), attended the jirga’s final session. He offered a rare admission that support for militants emanating from Pakistan has caused problems for Afghanistan, saying “There is no doubt Afghan militants are supported from Pakistan soil. The problem that you have in your region is because support is provided from our side.” The jirga ended with a declaration that included plans for dialogue with “the opposition,” i.e., the Taliban.¹⁹¹ In December 2007, Musharraf met with Karzai in Islamabad for a relatively cordial meeting after which the two men issued a joint statement reaffirming their commitment to intensifying counterterrorism cooperation.¹⁹²

Still, bilateral relations worsened in 2008. The Kabul government claimed to have evidence of Pakistani complicity in both an April 2008 assassination attempt on Karzai and in a July 2008 bombing of India’s Kabul Embassy. Afghan resentment over these incidents led the Karzai government to suspend its participation in bilateral and regional meetings that include Pakistan until such time as “bilateral trust is restored.”¹⁹³ In August, the Kabul government agreed to resume talks with Pakistan and Pakistan substantively re-engaged the Tripartite Commission when Army Chief Gen. Kayani traveled to Kabul to meet with his Afghan counterpart and ISAF Commander U.S. Gen. David McKiernan. In September, President Zardari and Afghan President Karzai reaffirmed a commitment to working together to resolve bilateral tensions and to fight the Taliban insurgency. The Pakistani and Afghan Ambassadors to the United States have jointly stressed the role of economic development and poverty reduction as counterterrorism tools. In this context, they strongly urged passage of pending U.S. legislation that would create Reconstruction Opportunity Zones in their mutual border regions.¹⁹⁴

¹⁹⁰ Polly Nayak, “The Impact of Pakistan’s and Bangladesh’s National Strategies on U.S. Interests,” Strategic Asia 2008-2009, National Bureau of Asian Research, September 2008.

¹⁹¹ “Pakistan Leader Snubs Afghan Meeting,” Reuters, August 8, 2007; “Afghan Rebels Find Haven in Pakistan, Musharraf Says,” New York Times, August 12, 2007. Declaration text at http://www.dailytimes.com.pk/print.asp?page=2007\08\13\story_13-8-2007_pg7_48.

¹⁹² See http://www.mofa.gov.pk/Press_Releases/2007/Dec/PR_306_07.htm.

¹⁹³ “Pakistan ‘Behind Afghan Attacks,’” BBC News, July 14, 2008; “Kabul Pulls Out of Talks With Pakistan,” Daily Times (Lahore), July 14, 2008.

¹⁹⁴ Husain Haqqani and Said Jawad, “Pakistan and Afghanistan Unite Against Terrorism” (op-ed), Wall Street Journal, (continued...)

China

Pakistan and China have enjoyed a generally close and mutually beneficial relationship over several decades. Pakistan served as a link between Beijing and Washington in 1971, as well as a bridge to the Muslim world for China during the 1980s. China's continuing role as a major arms supplier for Pakistan began in the 1960s and included helping to build a number of arms factories in Pakistan, as well as supplying complete weapons systems. After the 1990 imposition of U.S. sanctions on Pakistan, the Islamabad-Beijing arms relationship was further strengthened.¹⁹⁵ Pakistan continues to view China as an "all-weather friend" and perhaps its most important strategic ally.

Islamabad may seek future civil nuclear assistance from Beijing, including potential provision of complete power reactors, especially in light of Washington's categorical refusal of Pakistan's request for a civil nuclear cooperation similar to that being planned between the United States and India. The Chinese government has assisted Pakistan in constructing a major new port at Gwadar, near the border with Iran. Islamabad and Beijing aspire to make this port, officially opened in March 2007, a major commercial outlet for Central Asian states. Some Western and Indian analysts are concerned that the port may be used for military purposes and could bolster China's naval presence in the Indian Ocean region.

Analysts taking a realist, power political perspective view China as an external balancer in the South Asian subsystem, with Beijing's material support for Islamabad allowing Pakistan to challenge the aspiring regional hegemony of a more powerful India. Many observers, especially those in India, see Chinese support for Pakistan as a key aspect of Beijing's perceived policy of "encirclement" or constraint of India as a means of preventing or delaying New Delhi's ability to challenge Beijing's region-wide influence. Indian leaders have called the Islamabad-Beijing nuclear and missile "proliferation nexus" a cause of serious concern in New Delhi, and U.S. officials remain seized of this potentially destabilizing dynamic.

In 2005, China's Prime Minister visited Islamabad, where Pakistan and China signed 22 accords meant to boost bilateral cooperation. President Musharraf's five-day visit to Beijing in early 2006 saw bilateral discussions on counterterrorism, trade, and technical assistance. Chinese President Hu's late 2006 travel to Islamabad was the first such visit by a Chinese president in ten years; another 18 new bilateral pacts were inked, including a bilateral Free Trade Agreement. In mid-2007, Prime Minister Aziz visited Beijing, where Pakistan and China signed 27 new agreements and memoranda of understanding to "re-energize" bilateral cooperation in numerous areas, including defense, space technology, and trade. No public mention was made regarding civil nuclear cooperation. President Musharraf's April 2008 travel to Beijing produced ten new memoranda of understanding and a reiteration of the two countries "special relations."

In the month after he took office, President Zardari paid a visit to Beijing. Speculation on his central motive focused on Pakistan's urgent need for aid to correct its growing balance of payments deficit; China's huge foreign-exchange reserves are a potential source of a major cash infusion. Yet Zardari left Beijing without having secured any Chinese commitment in this area,

(...continued)

September 26, 2008.

¹⁹⁵ See CRS Report RL31555, China and Proliferation of Weapons of Mass Destruction and Missiles: Policy Issues, by Shirley A. Kan.

although reports did suggest that the Chinese had agreed to build two new nuclear power reactors in Pakistan.¹⁹⁶

Pakistan-U.S. Relations and Key Country Issues

U.S. policy interests in Pakistan encompass a wide range of issues, including counterterrorism, nuclear weapons and missile proliferation, South Asian and Afghan stability, democratization and human rights, trade and economic reform, and efforts to counter narcotics trafficking. Relations have been affected by several key developments, including proliferation- and democracy-related sanctions; a continuing Pakistan-India nuclear standoff and conflict over Kashmir; and the September 2001 terrorist attacks against the United States. In the wake of those attacks, President Musharraf—under intense U.S. diplomatic pressure—offered President Bush Pakistan’s “unstinted cooperation in the fight against terrorism.” Pakistan became a vital ally in the U.S.-led anti-terrorism coalition. U.S. sanctions relating to Pakistan’s 1998 nuclear tests and 1999 military coup quickly were waived and, in October 2001, large tranches of U.S. aid began flowing into Pakistan.

Direct U.S. assistance programs include training and equipment for Pakistani security forces, along with aid for health, education, food, democracy promotion, human rights improvement, counternarcotics, border security and law enforcement, as well as trade preference benefits. The United States also supports grant, loan, and debt rescheduling programs for Pakistan by the various major international financial institutions. In June 2004, President Bush designated Pakistan as a major non-NATO ally of the United States under Section 517 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961.

Terrorism

After the September 2001 terrorist attacks on the United States, Pakistan pledged and has provided major support for the U.S.-led global anti-terrorism coalition. According to the U.S. Departments of State and Defense, Pakistan has afforded the United States unprecedented levels of cooperation by allowing the U.S. military to use bases within the country, helping to identify and detain extremists, tightening the border between Pakistan and Afghanistan, and blocking terrorist financing.¹⁹⁷ Top U.S. officials regularly praise Pakistani anti-terrorism efforts.

In a landmark January 2002 speech, former President Musharraf vowed to end Pakistan’s use as a base for terrorism of any kind, and he banned numerous militant groups, including Lashkar-e-Taiba and Jaish-e-Muhammad, both blamed for terrorist violence in Kashmir and India, and both designated as terrorist organizations under U.S. law. In the wake of the speech, thousands of Muslim extremists were detained, though most of these were later released. In the spring of 2002, U.S. military and law enforcement personnel began engaging in direct, low-profile efforts to assist Pakistani security forces in tracking and apprehending fugitive Al Qaeda and Taliban fighters on Pakistani territory. Pakistani authorities claim to have captured some 700 Al Qaeda suspects and remanded most of these to U.S. custody.¹⁹⁸

¹⁹⁶ “Pakistan Secures China’s Help to Build 2 Nuclear Reactors,” Wall Street Journal, October 20, 2008.

¹⁹⁷ See, for example, “Pakistan Key Partner in War on Terror, Defense Department Says,” U.S. Department of State Washington File, March 6, 2006; “Pakistan ‘Indispensable’ in Global Anti-Terrorism Fight,” U.S. Department of State Washington File, July 25, 2007.

Important Al Qaeda-related arrests in Pakistan have included Abu Zubaydah (March 2002), Ramzi bin al-Shibh (September 2002), Khalid Sheik Mohammed (March 2003), and Abu Faraj al-Libbi (May 2005). Other allegedly senior Al Qaeda figures were killed in gunbattles and missile attacks, including in several apparent U.S.-directed attacks on Pakistani territory from armed aerial drones. Yet Al Qaeda fugitives and their Taliban allies remain active in Pakistan, especially in the mountainous tribal regions along the Afghan border. Meanwhile, numerous banned indigenous groups continue to operate under new names. For example, Lashkar-e-Taiba became Jamaat al-Dawat (banned under U.S. law in April 2006) and Jaish-e-Mohammed was re-dubbed Khudam-ul Islam.

Former President Musharraf repeatedly vowed to end the activities of religious extremists in Pakistan and to permanently prevent banned groups from resurfacing there. His policies likely spurred two lethal but failed attempts to assassinate him in 2003. Islamabad declared a four-pronged strategy to counter terrorism and religious extremism, containing military, political, administrative, and development aspects. Nonetheless, some analysts have long called the Islamabad government's post-2001 efforts cosmetic, ineffective, and the result of international pressure rather than a genuine recognition of the threat posed. Moreover, there are indications that Pakistan's intelligence agencies have over time lost control of some of the religious militants it previously had groomed to do its foreign policy bidding. In recent years, some Pakistani nationals and religious seminaries have been linked to Islamist terrorism plots in Western countries, especially the United Kingdom.¹⁹⁹ Reports also indicate that terrorist training camps operate on Pakistani soil.²⁰⁰

When asked during an early 2007 Senate hearing about the possible source of a hypothetical future Al Qaeda attack on the United States, the incoming Director of National Intelligence, Mike McConnell stated his belief that such an attack "most likely would be planned and come out of the [Al Qaeda] leadership in Pakistan."²⁰¹ According to then-Under Secretary of State Burns in July 2007 testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee,

We know that the tribal areas of the mountainous border regions inside Pakistan have never been within the effective control of any central government. We know that the regions of North and South Waziristan have become safehavens for violent extremist and terrorist activity.... [W]e would like to see a more sustained and effective effort by the Pakistani government to defeat terrorist forces on its soil.

¹⁹⁸ "Musharraf: Bhutto Knew of Risks" (interview), CBS News, January 6, 2008.

¹⁹⁹ Some more critical observers—many of them Indian—identify a Pakistani connection to nearly all major jihadi terrorist attacks worldwide; a few even seek to link elements of Pakistan's military-intelligence establishment to most jihadi terrorist attacks in the South Asia region (see, for example, Wilson John, "Pakistan's Drift Into Extremism and Its Impact," Observer Research Foundation (Delhi), January 8, 2008; K.P.S. Gill, "The ISI Mark," Outlook (Delhi), June 11, 2008).

²⁰⁰ "In Pakistan's Mountains, Jihadis Train for War," Wall Street Journal, July 28, 2008. One report claims that more than 100 "terror camps" are operating in western Pakistan, nearly a third of these in the Waziristan agencies ("More Than 100 Terror Camps' in Operation in Northwestern Pakistan," Long War Journal, July 11, 2008).

²⁰¹ Statement before the Senate Armed Services Committee, February 27, 2007. A July 2007 National Intelligence Estimate on the terrorist threat included the assessment that Al Qaeda has "protected or regenerated" its capability to attack the United States, in part due to its enjoying "safehaven" in Pakistan's tribal areas (see http://www.dni.gov/press_releases/20070717_release.pdf).

Although the United States lauded Islamabad's anti-terrorism financing efforts earlier this decade, Burns also encouraged more energetic Pakistani action in this area, expressing particular concern about terrorist groups exploiting charitable donations, and about their tactic of re-forming under new names to evade international prohibitions on donations to terrorist organizations. Burns urged Pakistan to pass an Anti-Money Laundering bill that meets international standards, and to establish a Financial Intelligence Unit within the State Bank of Pakistan.²⁰²

In mid-2007, Pakistan's National Security Council reportedly warned President Musharraf that Islamist militancy was rapidly spreading beyond western tribal areas and that a "policy of appeasement" had emboldened the Taliban. The Council was said to have formulated new plans to address the issue, including deployment of pilotless reconnaissance drones, bolstering local law enforcement capabilities, and shifting more paramilitary troops to the region from other parts of Pakistan.²⁰³ From the State Department's Country Reports on Terrorism 2007 (released April 2008):

The United States remained concerned that the Federally Administered Tribal Areas (FATA) of Pakistan were being used as a safe haven for Al Qaeda terrorists, Afghan insurgents, and other extremists.... Extremists led by Baitullah Mehsud and other Al Qaeda-related extremists re-exerted their hold in areas of South Waziristan.... Extremists have also gained footholds in the settled areas bordering the FATA.

The report noted that the trend and sophistication of suicide bombings grew in Pakistan during 2007, when there was more than twice as many such attacks (at least 45) as in the previous five years combined.²⁰⁴

Congressional analysts have identified serious shortcomings in the Administration's FATA policy to date. In April, the U.S. Government Accountability Office (GAO) issued a report in response to congressional requests for assessment of progress in meeting U.S. national security goals related to counterterrorism efforts in Pakistan's FATA. Their investigation found that, "The United States has not met its national security goals to destroy terrorist threats and close safe haven in Pakistan's FATA," and, "No comprehensive plan for meeting U.S. national security goals in the FATA has been developed." The Chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, Representative Howard Berman, called the report's conclusions "appalling."²⁰⁵

Pakistani officials resent criticism and doubt about their commitment to the counterterrorist fight. They aver that Western pressure on Pakistan to "do more" undermines their effort and has in fact fueled instability and violence.²⁰⁶ Some argue that their "Waziristan problem" is largely traceable to U.S. policies in the region. From this perspective, the United States essentially abandoned the region after infusing it with money and arms during the 1980s, thus "leaving the jihadi baby in Pakistan's lap." Furthermore, a U.S. failure to decisively defeat Afghan Taliban remnants in 2002, a diversion of key resources to the war in Iraq and the recruiting boon that war provided to jihadi

²⁰² See <http://www.state.gov/p/us/rm/2007/89418.htm>.

²⁰³ "Pakistani President Reviews Political, Economic, Anti-Terrorism Measures," BBC Monitoring South Asia, June 4, 2007.

²⁰⁴ See <http://www.state.gov/s/ct/rls/crt/2007/103709.htm>.

²⁰⁵ See <http://www.gao.gov/new.items/d08622.pdf>; http://internationalrelations.house.gov/press_print.asp?id=504.

²⁰⁶ "Cheney Warns Pakistan to Act on Terrorism," New York Times, February 25, 2007; "US May Be 'Undermining' Pakistan," BBC News, March 1, 2007; "UK's War 'Failure Sparked Pakistan Violence,'" Telegraph (London), March 26, 2008; author interviews with Pakistani government officials.

groups, and a perceived over-reliance on allegedly ill-equipped NATO troops all combined to build and sustain in western Pakistan a religious extremist movement that did not previously exist.²⁰⁷

Al Qaeda's Resurgence in Pakistan

Al Qaeda founder Osama Bin Laden and his lieutenant, Egyptian Islamic radical leader Ayman al-Zawahri, are believed by many to be hiding somewhere in Pakistan's western border region. Pakistani officials reject such suspicions and generally insist there is no evidence to support them, but numerous U.S. officials have suggested otherwise. In 2006, President Bush said he would order U.S. forces to enter Pakistan if he received good intelligence on bin Laden's location.²⁰⁸ Islamabad reportedly has remanded to U.S. custody roughly 500 Al Qaeda fugitives to date, including some senior alleged operatives. However, despite clear successes in disrupting extremist networks in Pakistan since 2001, there are numerous signs that Al Qaeda is resurgent on Pakistani territory, with anti-U.S. terrorists appearing to have benefitted from what some analysts call a Pakistani policy of appeasement in western tribal areas near the Afghan border.

By seeking accommodation with pro-Taliban leaders in these areas, the Musharraf government may inadvertently have allowed foreign (largely Arab) militants to obtain safe haven from which they can plot and train for terrorist attacks against U.S. and other Western targets. Moreover, many observers warn that an American preoccupation with Iraq contributed to allowing Al Qaeda's reemergence in Pakistan.²⁰⁹ The head of the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency, Michael Hayden, has portrayed Al Qaeda as being on the defensive in South Asia, claiming that its leadership is losing the battle for hearts and minds in the Muslim world. Some independent analysts agree that Al Qaeda's "grand project" of establishing a militant Islamic caliphate has been a resounding failure, but warn that the group remains potent and serves as a model for jihadi groups around the world.²¹⁰

Infiltration Into Afghanistan

Tensions between the Kabul and Islamabad governments—which stretch back many decades—have at times reached alarming levels in recent years, with top Afghan officials accusing Pakistan of manipulating Islamic militancy in the region to destabilize Afghanistan. Likewise, U.S. military commanders in Afghanistan have since 2003 complained that Islamist insurgents remain able to attack coalition troops in Afghanistan, then escape across the Pakistani frontier. U.S. government officials voice similar worries, even expressing concern that elements of Pakistan's intelligence agency might be assisting members of the Taliban. In 2006, the State Department's top counterterrorism official told a Senate panel that elements of Pakistan's "local, tribal governments" are believed to be in collusion with the Taliban and Al Qaeda, but that the United States had no "compelling evidence" that Pakistan's intelligence agency is assisting militants.²¹¹

²⁰⁷ See, for example, Ali Abbas Rizvi, "American Connection to the Waziristan Problem" (op-ed), News (Karachi), January 29, 2008. Author discussions with Pakistani nationals commonly touch upon this historical narrative.

²⁰⁸ "Bush Would Send Troops Inside Pakistan to Catch bin Laden," CNN.com, September 20, 2006.

²⁰⁹ See, for example, Bruce Riedel, "Al Qaeda Strikes Back," Foreign Affairs, May 2007; "Influx of Al Qaeda, Money Into Pakistan Is Seen," Los Angeles Times, May 20, 2007.

²¹⁰ "U.S. Cites Big Gains Against Al Qaeda," Washington Post, May 30, 2008; Peter Bergen, "Al Qaeda at 20 Dead or Alive?" (op-ed), Washington Post, August 17, 2008.

²¹¹ Statement of Henry Crumpton before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, June 13, 2006. After conducting (continued...)

Later that year, the Commander of the U.S. European Command told the same Senate panel it was “generally accepted” that the Taliban headquarters is somewhere in the vicinity of Quetta, the capital of Pakistan’s southwestern Baluchistan province.²¹²

The more than 100,000 Pakistani troops operating in the border region are hampered by limited communications and other counterinsurgency capabilities, meaning their response to provocations can be overly reliant on imprecise, mass firepower. This has contributed to a significant number of civilian casualties. Simultaneously, tribal leaders who cooperate with the federal government face dire threats from the extremists—as many as 500 have been the victims of targeted killings—and the militants have sought to deter such cooperation by regularly beheading accused “U.S. spies.”

Pakistan Launches Internal Military Operations

In late 2003, President Musharraf made an unprecedented show of force by moving 25,000 Pakistani troops into the traditionally autonomous FATA on the Afghan frontier. The first half of 2004 saw an escalation of Pakistani army operations, many in coordination with U.S. and Afghan forces just across the international frontier.²¹³ Kabul’s October 2004 elections were held without major disturbances, apparently in part due to Musharraf’s commitment to reducing infiltrations. Yet concerns sharpened in 2005 and, by the middle of that year, Afghan leaders were openly accusing Islamabad of supporting insurgents and providing their leadership with safe haven. Islamabad denied the charges and sought to reassure Kabul by dispatching additional troops to border areas, bringing the total to 80,000. Still, 2006 was the deadliest year to date for U.S. troops in Afghanistan and, at year’s end, there were growing indications that Islamabad’s efforts to control the tribal areas were meeting with little success. Former President Musharraf’s “carrot and stick” approach of offering amnesty to those militant tribals who “surrendered,” and using force against those who resisted, clearly did not rid the region of Islamist militants.

(...continued)

interviews with numerous active and retired Pakistan army and intelligence officials, one American reporter concluded in 2007 that “many officers of Pakistan’s covert security agencies remain emotionally committed to jihad and hostile to the U.S. role in the region” (“Role of Pakistan’s ‘Captain’ Shows Enduring Taliban Ties,” Newsday, October 14, 2007).

²¹² Statement of Gen. James Jones before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, September 21, 2006. See also “In the Land of the Taliban,” New York Times, October 22, 2006; “Next-Gen Taliban,” New York Times, January 6, 2008. The Pakistani Taliban differ from their Afghan brethren in several respects, perhaps most significantly in a lack of organization and cohesion, and they possess no unified leadership council. Moreover, the Pakistani Taliban appear to have more limited objectives, in contrast with the Afghan Taliban who are struggling to regain national power in Kabul. At the same time, however, both groups pledge fealty to a single leader—Mullah Omar—and both share fundamental policy objectives with regard to U.S. and other Western government roles in the region (see “The Emergence of the Pakistani Taliban,” Jane’s Islamic Affairs Analyst, January 1, 2008).

²¹³ U.S. forces have no official authorization to cross the border into Pakistan. One U.S. press report claimed that Pentagon documents from 2004 gave U.S. special forces in Afghanistan authority to enter Pakistani territory—even without prior notice to Islamabad—while in “hot pursuit” of Al Qaeda and Taliban fighters or to take direct action against “the Big 3”: Osama bin Laden, Ayman al Zawahri, or Mullah Omar. A Pakistani military spokesman called the report “nonsense” and denied there was any such arrangement (“U.S. OK’d Troop Terror Hunts in Pakistan,” Associated Press, August 23, 2007).

Islamabad Shifts Strategy

As military operations failed to subdue the militants while causing much “collateral damage” and alienating local residents, Islamabad in 2004 began shifting strategy and sought to arrange truces with Waziri commanders, first at Shakai in South Waziristan in April 2004, then again in February 2005. Officials in Islamabad recognized that the social fabric of the FATA had changed following its role as a staging and recruiting area for the war against the Soviet Army in Afghanistan during the 1980s: the traditional power base was eroded as the influence of religious elements had greatly increased. President Musharraf lambasted the creeping “Talibanization” of the tribal areas and sought to implement a new scheme, shifting over time from an almost wholly militarized approach to one emphasizing negotiation and economic development in the FATA, as well as re-elevating the role of tribal maliks who would work in closer conjunction with federal political agents. The aim, then, became restoration of a kind of enhanced status quo ante with a limited state writ (maliks would enjoy more pay and larger levies), and the reduction and ultimately full withdrawal of army troops. The U.S. government offered cautious initial support for the new strategy.²¹⁴

Cease-Fire and North Waziristan Truce

In mid-2006, militants in North Waziristan announced a unilateral cease-fire to allow for creation of a tribal council seeking resolution with government forces. On September 5, 2006, the Islamabad government and pro-Taliban insurgents in Miramshah, North Waziristan, signed a truce to ensure “permanent peace” in the region. A representative of the provincial governor agreed on behalf of the government to end army operations against local tribesmen; release all detainees; lift all public sanctions, pay compensation for property damage, return confiscated vehicles and other goods; and remove all new army checkpoints. In turn, two representatives of the “local mujahideen students” (trans. “Taliban”) agreed to end their attacks on government troops and officials; halt the cross-border movement of insurgents to Afghanistan; and evict all foreigners who did not agree to live in peace and honor the pact.²¹⁵

News of the truce received lukewarm reception in Washington, where officials took a “wait-and-see” approach. Within weeks there was growing concern among both U.S. government officials and independent analysts that the truce represented a Pakistani “surrender” and had in effect created a sanctuary for extremists, with the rate of Taliban activities in neighboring Afghanistan much increased. Still, Islamabad pressed ahead with a plan to extend a similar truce to the Bajaur tribal agency. Only hours before such a deal was to be struck on October 30, 2006, 82 people were killed in a dawn air attack on a madrassa in Chingai, Bajaur. The Pakistani military claimed to have undertaken the attack after the school’s pro-Taliban leader continued to train terrorists and shelter “unwanted foreigners,” yet many observers speculated that U.S. Predator drones were involved. Nine days later, a suicide bomber killed 42 army recruits at a military training camp at Dargai in the NWFP, not far from the sight of the Chingai attack. The bombing was the most deadly attack on the Pakistani military in recent memory.

²¹⁴ Author interview with senior Pakistani official, Islamabad, September 2006; “President General Pervez Musharraf’s Address to the Nation,” July 20, 2006; “White House Backing New Plan to Defuse Insurrection in Pakistan,” McClatchy, August 16, 2006.

²¹⁵ A translated version of the pact is at <http://www.pbs.org/wgbh/pages/frontline/taliban/etc/nwdeal.html>.

The FATA in 2007

Instability in the FATA only increased in 2007, with a large trust deficit between government forces and tribal leaders, and a conclusion by top U.S. officials that President Musharraf's strategy of making truce deals with pro-Taliban militants had failed. In January, the director of the U.S. Defense Intelligence Agency, Lt. Gen. Michael Maples, told a Senate panel that tribal leaders in Waziristan had not abided by most terms of the September 2006 North Waziristan truce.²¹⁶ In March, Undersecretary of Defense for Policy Edelman reported to the same panel that there was "an almost immediate and steady increase of cross-border infiltration and attacks" just after that agreement had been reached. Some reports even describe anecdotes of the Pakistani military providing fire support for Taliban units operating in Afghanistan. The now-defunct September 2006 peace deal clearly failed to curb violence and religious militancy in the region and had no apparent effect on the continued cross-border movement of pro-Taliban forces into Afghanistan. Many analysts insist that any such future agreements of this nature are doomed to similar failure in the absence of substantive changes in Pakistan's fundamental regional and domestic policies.²¹⁷

By the close of 2007, U.S. intelligence analysts had amassed considerable evidence that Islamabad's truces with religious militants in the FATA had given Taliban, Al Qaeda, and other Islamist extremists space in which to rebuild their networks. A behind-the-scenes diplomatic effort to prod the Islamabad government on its counterterrorism strategy was ramped up during the course of the year, but it may have only been through more public and strongly-worded U.S. criticisms of Pakistan in July that Islamabad was convinced to be more energetic in its militarized efforts.²¹⁸ A spate of militant attacks on Pakistani military targets during that month, apparently in retaliation for the government's armed assault on Islamabad's radical Red Mosque, led Musharraf to further bolster the army's presence in the region. Top Bush Administration officials suggested the tack of seeking accommodation with regional extremist elements should be abandoned.²¹⁹ Many analysts insist that only by bringing the tribal areas under the full writ of the Pakistani state and facilitating major economic development there can the FATA problem be resolved.

Infiltration into Kashmir and India

Islamabad has been under continuous U.S. and international pressure to terminate the infiltration of separatist militants across the Kashmiri Line of Control (LOC). Such pressure reportedly elicited a January 2002 promise from President Musharraf to U.S. Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage that all such movements would cease. During a June 2002 visit to Islamabad, Armitage reportedly received another pledge from the Pakistani president, this time an assurance that any existing terrorist camps in Pakistani Kashmir would be closed. Musharraf has assured India that he will not permit any territory under Pakistan's control to be used to support terrorism, and he insists that his government has done everything possible to stop infiltration and shut down militant base camps in Pakistani-controlled territory. Critics contend, however, that Islamabad continues to actively support anti-India militants as a means both to maintain strategically the domestic backing of Islamists who view the Kashmir issue as fundamental to the Pakistani ²¹⁶ Statement before the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, January 11, 2007.

²¹⁷ See, for example, Evangoras Leventis, "The Waziristan Accord," Middle East Review of International Affairs 11,4, December 2007.

²¹⁸ "Tougher Stance on Pakistan Took Months," Washington Post, August 5, 2007.

²¹⁹ "U.S. Boosts Pressure on Musharraf Over Al Qaeda," Reuters, July 18, 2007.

national idea, and to disrupt tactically the state government in Indian Kashmir in seeking to erode New Delhi's legitimacy there.

Positive indications growing from the latest Pakistan-India peace initiative include a cease-fire at the LOC that has held since November 2003 and statements from Indian officials indicating that rates of militant infiltration are down significantly. However, Indian leaders periodically reiterate their complaints that Islamabad has taken insufficient action to eradicate the remaining "infrastructure of terrorism" on Pakistani-controlled territory. With indications that terrorism on Indian soil beyond the Jammu and Kashmir state may have been linked to Pakistan-based terrorist groups, Indian leaders repeat demands that Pakistan uphold its promises to curtail the operations of Islamic militants and violent Kashmiri separatists originating on Pakistani-controlled territory.

Following conflicting reports from Indian government officials about the criminal investigation into July 2006 Bombay terrorist bombings, India's prime minister stated that India had "credible evidence" of Pakistani government complicity in the plot. Islamabad rejected Indian accusations as "propaganda" designed "to externalize an internal [Indian] malaise."²²⁰ Several other terrorist attacks against Indian targets outside of Kashmir have been linked to Pakistan-based groups, including lethal assaults on civilians in Delhi and Bangalore in 2005, in Varanasi in 2006, and in Hyderabad in 2007. Indian security officials also routinely blame Pakistan's intelligence service for assisting the infiltration of Islamist militants into India from Nepal, Bangladesh, and Bhutan, as well as across the Kashmiri LOC.²²¹

Domestic Terrorism

Pakistan is known to be a base for numerous indigenous terrorist organizations, and the country continues to suffer from terrorism at home. Until a March 2006 car bombing at the U.S. consulate in Karachi that left one American diplomat dead, post-2001 attacks on Western targets had been rare, but 2002 saw several acts of lethal anti-Western terrorism, including the kidnaping and murder of reporter Daniel Pearl, a grenade attack on a Protestant church in Islamabad that killed a U.S. Embassy employee, and two car bomb attacks, including one on the same U.S. consulate. These attacks, widely viewed as expressions of militants' anger with the Musharraf regime for its cooperation with the United States, were linked to Al Qaeda, as well as to indigenous militant groups, by U.S. and Pakistani officials. Some analysts believe that, by redirecting Pakistan's internal security resources, an increase in militant violence can ease pressure on Al Qaeda and affiliated groups and so allow them to operate more freely there.

From 2003-2006, Pakistan's most serious domestic terrorism was directed against the country's Shia minority and included suicide bomb attacks that killed scores of people. Indications are that the indigenous Lashkar-e-Jhangvi (LJ) Sunni terrorist group is responsible for the most deadly anti-Shia violence. Two attempts to kill Musharraf in December 2003 and failed efforts to assassinate other top Pakistani officials in 2004 were linked to the LJ and other Al Qaeda-allied groups, and illuminated the grave and continuing danger presented by religious extremists.

²²⁰ "We Have Credible Evidence: Manmohan," Hindu (Madras), October 25, 2006; Pakistan Ministry of Foreign Affairs Media Briefing, October 2, 2006.

²²¹ According to India's national security advisor, most terrorist activity in India has been "generated from outside" ("MK Narayanan" (interview), India Abroad, September 21, 2007).

Following a July 2006 suicide bombing in Karachi that killed a prominent Shiite cleric, Musharraf renewed his pledge to crack down on religious extremists; hundreds of Sunni clerics and activists were subsequently arrested for inciting violence against Shiites through sermons and printed materials. However, serious sectarian and other religiously-motivated violence flared anew in late 2006 and continued in 2007. Bomb attacks, many of them by suicidal extremists motivated by sectarian hatreds, killed scores of people; some reports link the upsurge in such attacks to growing sectarian conflict in Iraq.

Other Security Issues

Pakistan-U.S. Security Cooperation

U.S.-Pakistan security cooperation accelerated rapidly after 2001, and President Bush formally designated Pakistan as a major non-NATO U.S. ally in June 2004. The close U.S.-Pakistan security ties of the cold war era, which came to a near halt after the 1990 aid cutoff, have been restored as a result of Pakistan's role in the U.S.-led anti-terrorism campaign. In 2002, the United States began allowing commercial sales that enabled Pakistan to refurbish at least part of its fleet of American-made F-16 fighter aircraft and, three years later, Washington announced that it would resume sales of new F-16 fighters to Pakistan after a 16-year hiatus. A revived high-level U.S.-Pakistan Defense Consultative Group (DCG)—moribund from 1997 to 2001—sits for high-level discussions on military cooperation, security assistance, and anti-terrorism; its most recent session came in May 2006. In 2003, a U.S.-Pakistan-Afghanistan Tripartite Commission was established to bring together military commanders for discussions on Afghan stability and border security. Officers from NATO's International Security Assistance Force in Afghanistan have since joined the body.

Defense Supplies

Major government-to-government arms sales and grants to Pakistan since 2001 have included items useful for counterterrorism operations, along with a number of "big ticket" platforms more suited to conventional warfare. In dollar value terms, the bulk of purchases are made with Pakistani national funds: the Pentagon reports total Foreign Military Sales agreements with Pakistan worth $4.55 billion for FY2002-FY2007 (in-process sales of F-16 combat aircraft and related equipment account for about three-quarters of this). The United States also has provided Pakistan with nearly $1.6 billion in Foreign Military Financing (FMF) since 2001, with a "base program" of $300 million per year beginning in FY2005. These funds are used to purchase U.S. military equipment. Pakistan also has been granted U.S. defense supplies as Excess Defense Articles (EDA). Major post-2001 defense supplies paid for with FMF include the following:

- eight P-3C Orion maritime patrol aircraft and their refurbishment (valued at $474 million);
- about 5,250 TOW anti-armor missiles ($186 million; 2,007 delivered);
- more than 5,600 military radio sets ($163 million);
- six AN/TPS-77 surveillance radars ($100 million, all delivered and in operation);
- six C-130E transport aircraft and their refurbishment ($76 million, all delivered and in operation); and

- 20 AH-1F Cobra attack helicopters granted under EDA, then refurbished ($48 million, 12 delivered, 8 pending refurbishment).

Supplies paid for with a mix of Pakistani national funds and FMF include:

- up to 60 mid-life update kits for F-16A/B combat aircraft (valued at $891 million, with at least $335 million of this in FMF; Pakistan's current plans are to purchase 46 of these); and
- 115 M-109 self-propelled howitzers ($87 million, with $53 million in FMF).

Notable items paid for entirely with Pakistani national funds include:

- 18 new F-16C/D Block 50/52 combat aircraft, with an option for 18 more (valued at $1.43 billion);
- F-16 armaments including 500 AMRAAM air-to-air missiles; 1,450 2,000-pound bombs; 500 JDAM bomb tail kits; and 1,600 Enhanced Paveway laser-guided bomb kits ($667 million);
- 100 Harpoon anti-ship missiles ($298 million, 88 delivered);
- 500 Sidewinder air-to-air missiles ($95 million, 420 delivered);
- six Phalanx close-in naval guns ($80 million).²²²

While the Pentagon has notified Congress to the possible transfer to Pakistan of three P-3B aircraft as EDA grants that would be modified to carry the E-2C Hawkeye airborne early warning suite in a deal worth up to $855 million, negotiations have not progressed beyond the notification stage. If implemented, FMF could be used toward this purchase. Major EDA grants since 2001 include 14 F-16A/B combat aircraft and 16 T-37 military trainer jets (20 more are pending). Pakistan may receive an EDA Oliver Perry-class anti-submarine frigate, the USS McInerney, in mid-2010 (the transfer was authorized by Congress in October 2008). Islamabad reportedly has requested $65 million worth of refurbishment and weapons for the 40-year-old vessel.²²³ Under Coalition Support Funds (part of the Pentagon budget), Pakistan received 26 Bell 412 helicopters, along with related parts and maintenance, valued at $235 million. The Defense Department has characterized F-16 fighters, P-3C patrol aircraft, and anti-armor missiles as having significant anti-terrorism applications. The State Department claims that, since 2005, FMF funds have been "solely for counterterrorism efforts, broadly defined."²²⁴ Such claims elicit skepticism from some observers. Moreover, analysts who emphasize the importance of strengthening the U.S.-India strategic partnership call U.S. military aid to Pakistan incompatible with U.S. strategic goals in the region.²²⁵

Other security-related U.S. assistance programs for Pakistan are said to be aimed especially at bolstering Islamabad's counterterrorism and border security efforts, and have included U.S.-funded road-building projects in the NWFP and FATA; and the provision of night-vision

²²² Data reported by the U.S. Department of Defense. See also CRS Report RS22757, U.S. Arms Sales to Pakistan.

²²³ "US Sanctions Frigate Transfer to Pakistan," Jane's Naval International, October 22, 2008.

²²⁴ See <http://www.state.gov/p/sca/rls/rm/2007/97946.htm>.

²²⁵ See, for example, Selig Harrison, "Support to Pakistan Distorts Asia's Balance of Power" (op-ed), Boston Globe, September 27, 2008.

equipment, communications gear, protective vests, and transport helicopters and aircraft. The United States also has undertaken to train and equip new Pakistan Army Air Assault units that can move quickly to find and target terrorist elements. Modest U.S.-funded military education and training programs seek to enhance the professionalism of Pakistan's military leaders, and develop respect for rule of law, human rights, and democratic values.

Some reports indicate that U.S. military assistance to Pakistan has failed to effectively bolster the paramilitary forces battling Islamist militants in western Pakistan. Such forces are said to remain underfunded, poorly trained, and "overwhelmingly outgunned."²²⁶ However, a July 2008 Pentagon-funded assessment found that Section 1206 "Global Train and Equip" funding was important for providing urgently needed military assistance to Pakistan and that the counterinsurgency capabilities of Pakistani special operations forces were measurably improved by the training and equipment that came through such funding.²²⁷ The Bush Administration has launched an initiative to strengthen the capacity of the Frontier Corps (FC), an 80,000-man paramilitary force overseen by the Pakistani Interior Ministry. The FC has primary responsibility for border security in the NWFP and Baluchistan provinces. The Pentagon in 2007 began using its funds to train and equip the FC, as well as to increase the involvement of the U.S. Special Operations Command in assisting with Pakistani counterterrorism efforts. Fewer than 100 Americans reportedly have been engaged in training Pakistan's elite Special Service Group commandos with a goal of doubling that force's size to 5,000.²²⁸

U.S. security assistance to Pakistan's civilian sector is aimed at strengthening the country's law enforcement capabilities through basic police training, provision of advanced identification systems, and establishment of a new Counterterrorism Special Investigation Group. U.S. efforts may be hindered by Pakistani shortcomings that include poorly trained and poorly equipped personnel who generally are underpaid by ineffectively coordinated and overburdened government agencies.²²⁹ A 2008 think-tank report asserts that Pakistan's police and civilian intelligence agencies are better suited to combatting insurgency and terrorism than are the country's regular army. It finds that Pakistan's police forces are "incapable of combating crime, upholding the law, or protecting citizens and the state against militant violence," and places the bulk of responsibility on the politicization of the police forces. The report recommends sweeping reforms to address corruption and human rights abuses.²³⁰

²²⁶ "U.S. Aid to Pakistan Misses Al Qaeda Target," Los Angeles Times, November 5, 2007.

²²⁷ "Assessments of the Impact of 1206-Funded Projects in Selected Countries," CNA Corporation, July 2008.

²²⁸ "Pentagon Draws Up Plans to Train, Expand Pakistani Frontier Corps," Agence France -Presse, November 19, 2007; "U.S. to Step Up Training of Pakistanis," Washington Post, January 24, 2008; "Joint Chiefs Chairman and Musharraf Discuss Terror Threat," New York Times, February 10, 2008. One former Pakistani police official, presently a Harvard University-based analyst, opines that, without fundamental structural reforms, the prospects for meaningfully improving Frontier Corps capabilities are dim. Among his recommended changes are the appointment of more local tribesmen into command positions and a restoration of the authority of local political agents (Hassan Abbas, "Transforming Pakistan's Frontier Corps," Terrorism Monitor, March 29, 2007).

²²⁹ See, for example, Seth Jones, et al., "Securing Tyrants or Fostering Reform?," RAND Corporation Monograph, January 7, 2007.

²³⁰ "Reforming Pakistan's Police," International Crisis Group Asia Report No. 157, July 14, 2008.

Renewed F-16 Sales and Congressional Concerns²³¹

In 2005, the State Department announced a renewal of F-16 sales to Pakistan after a 16-year hiatus. A subsequent October 2005 earthquake in northern Pakistan put the F-16 purchase program on hold and led to a sharp reduction in the number of aircraft requested by Pakistan, which originally had been 75. In June 2006, the Pentagon notified Congress of a possible Foreign Military Sale to Pakistan worth up to $5.1 billion. The deal involves 18 newly-built F-16 Block 50/52 aircraft, along with related munitions and equipment, and represents the largest-ever weapons sale to Pakistan (Islamabad later declined an option to purchase 18 additional new aircraft). Associated munitions for new F-16s and for mid-life upgrades on others include 500 AMRAAM air-to-air missiles and thousands of both gravity and “smart” bombs.²³²

Congressional concerns about the sale and displeasure at the Bush Administration’s apparently improper notification procedures spurred a July 2006 hearing of the House International Relations Committee. During that session, many Members worried that F-16s were better suited to fighting India than to combating terrorists; some warned that U.S. military technology could be passed from Pakistan to China. The State Department’s lead official on political-military relations sought to assure the committee that the sale would serve U.S. interests by strengthening the defense capabilities of a key ally without disturbing the regional balance of power and that all possible measures would be taken to prevent the onward transfer of U.S. technologies. H.J.Res. 93, disapproving the proposed sale, was introduced in the House, but died in committee.

Secretary of State Rice subsequently informed Congress that no F-16 combat aircraft or related equipment would be delivered to Pakistan until Islamabad provided written security assurances that U.S. technology will not be accessible by third parties. Islamabad has denied that any “extraordinary” security requirements were requested; however, congressional concerns appear to have been satisfactorily addressed. After further negotiations on specifics, including a payment process that requires a major outlay from the Pakistani treasury, the United States and Pakistan signed a September 2006 letter of acceptance for the multi-billion dollar F-16 deal. Since then, several major U.S. defense corporations have won contracts worth hundreds of millions of dollars to supply F-16 parts and munitions to Pakistan, including a December 2007 award to Lockheed-Martin worth about $500 million.

F-16 Reprogramming

In July 2008, the State Department notified Congress of its intention to shift $227 million in FY2008 FMF funds toward supporting Pakistan’s F-16 mid-life update program. The Islamabad government had in 2006 vowed to use its own national funds for the bulk of such upgrades. The proposal was met with anger and dismay by some in Congress who said the move would do little to enhance Pakistan’s counterterrorism capabilities. A State Department spokesman asserted that Islamabad sought and was granted the consideration so as to provide much-needed financial relief to the Pakistani government. Two senior House Members, concerned that the proposal would “divert funds from more effective counterterrorism tools,” requested a hold be placed on the planned reprogramming and proposed that Congress provide $200 million in budgetary support to ²³¹ See also CRS Report RL33515, Combat Aircraft Sales to South Asia: Potential Implications, by Christopher Bolkcom, Richard F. Grimmett, and K. Alan Kronstadt.

²³² See http://www.dsca.osd.mil/PressReleases/36-b/2006/Pakistan_06-09.pdf; http://www.dsca.osd.mil/PressReleases/36-b/2006/Pakistan_06-34.pdf; and http://www.dsca.osd.mil/PressReleases/36-b/2006/Pakistan_06-10.pdf.

Pakistan.²³³ The hold request was not honored and $116 million in reprogrammed funds was disbursed in August. More such reprogramming of FMF funds may come in FY2009. Pakistani pilots are slated to receive U.S. training in precision nighttime ground attack beginning in early 2009.²³⁴

At a subsequent September hearing on Pakistan's F-16 program, the chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on the Middle East and South Asia, Representative Gary Ackerman, criticized what he called the Bush Administration's "cavalier discard" of congressional concerns about the appropriate uses of Foreign Military Sales. He and other Members in attendance cast doubt on the efficacy of F-16s as counterinsurgency weapons. The State Department official testifying insisted that, by paying for upgrades to Pakistan's existing F-16s, the United States would both bolster that country's counterterrorism capabilities and ease fiscal pressures on the new civilian government. He said the aircraft had become "an iconic symbol" of the U.S. commitment to Pakistan.²³⁵

Nuclear Weapons and Missile Proliferation²³⁶

Many policy analysts consider an apparent arms race between India and Pakistan to be among the most likely potential causes of the future use of nuclear weapons by states. In May 1998, India conducted unannounced nuclear tests, breaking a 24-year, self-imposed moratorium on such testing. Despite U.S. and world efforts to dissuade it, Pakistan quickly followed. The tests created a global storm of criticism and represented a serious setback to two decades of U.S. nuclear nonproliferation efforts in South Asia. Pakistan currently is believed to have enough fissile material, mainly enriched uranium, for 55-90 nuclear weapons; India, with a program focused on plutonium, may be capable of building a similar number. Both countries have aircraft capable of delivering nuclear bombs (U.S.-supplied F-16 combat aircraft in Pakistan's air force reportedly have been refitted to carry nuclear bombs).²³⁷ Pakistan's military has inducted short- and medium-range ballistic missiles (allegedly acquired from China and North Korea), while India possesses short- and intermediate-range missiles. Both countries have tested cruise missiles with radar-evading capabilities. All missiles are assumed to be capable of delivering nuclear warheads over significant distances. In 2000, Pakistan placed its nuclear forces under the control of a National Command Authority chaired by the President. According to the most recent global threat assessment by the U.S. Director of National Intelligence, "Although both New Delhi and Islamabad are fielding a more mature strategic nuclear capability, they do not appear to be engaged in a Cold War-style arms race for numerical superiority."²³⁸

²³³ "Plans Would Use Antiterror Aid on Pakistani Jets," New York Times, July 24, 2008; <http://www.state.gov/r/pa/prs/dpb/2008/july/107436.htm>; the July 27, 2008, Lowey-Berman statement is at http://www.internationalrelations.house.gov/press_display.asp?id=540.

²³⁴ "Pakistani Pilots Will Get U.S. Training in F-16 Ground Attack," Bloomberg News, September 16, 2008.

²³⁵ "House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on the Middle East and South Asia Holds Hearing on Pakistan's F-16 Program," CQ Transcripts, September 16, 2008.

²³⁶ See also CRS Report RL32115, Missile Proliferation and the Strategic Balance in South Asia, and CRS Report RL34248, Pakistan's Nuclear Weapons: Proliferation and Security Issues.

²³⁷ "Pakistan Jets Said to be Nuclear-Capable," Associated Press, July 25, 1989.

²³⁸ Statement of J. Michael McConnell before the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, February 5, 2008, at <http://intelligence.senate.gov/080205/mcconnell.pdf>.

*The A.Q. Khan Nuclear Proliferation Network*²³⁹

Sensitive Pakistani nuclear materials and technologies have been transferred illicitly to third parties. Press reports in late 2002 suggested that Pakistan assisted Pyongyang's covert nuclear weapons program by providing North Korea with uranium enrichment materials and technologies beginning in the mid-1990s. Islamabad rejected such reports as "baseless" and Secretary of State Colin Powell was assured that no such transfers were occurring. Under U.S. law, if such assistance is confirmed by the U.S. President, all non-humanitarian U.S. aid to Pakistan may be suspended, although the President has the authority to waive any sanctions that he determines would jeopardize U.S. national security. In early 2003, the Bush Administration determined that the relevant facts "do not warrant imposition of sanctions under applicable U.S. laws." Press reports during 2003 suggested that both Iran and Libya benefitted from Pakistani nuclear assistance. Islamabad denied any nuclear cooperation with Tehran or Tripoli, although it conceded in December 2003 that certain senior scientists were under investigation for possible "independent" proliferation activities.

The investigation led to the February 2004 "public humiliation" of metallurgist Abdul Qadeer Khan, known as the founder of Pakistan's nuclear weapons program and a national hero, when he confessed to involvement in an illicit nuclear smuggling network. Khan and at least seven associates were said to have sold crucial nuclear weapons technology and uranium-enrichment materials to North Korea, Iran, and Libya. Such technology may have included complete blueprints for an advanced nuclear weapon design.²⁴⁰ President Musharraf, citing Khan's contributions to his nation, issued a pardon that was later called conditional.²⁴¹ The United States has been assured that the Islamabad government had no knowledge of such activities; Washington called the decision to pardon an internal Pakistani matter. Some independent observers insist that Khan's activities were, in fact, well known to top Pakistani authorities and that elements of the U.S. government turned a blind eye to the proliferation while seeking Pakistan's continued cooperation with other foreign policy efforts.²⁴² Khan himself has alleged that at least one illicit shipment of uranium enrichment equipment to North Korea was supervised by the Pakistani army with the consent of then-Army Chief Musharraf. A spokesman for Musharraf called the allegations "lies."²⁴³

While President Musharraf did promise President Bush that all information learned about Khan's proliferation network would be shared, Pakistan has refused to allow any direct access to Khan by U.S. or international investigators. In May 2006, days after releasing from detention nuclear scientist and suspected Khan collaborator Mohammed Farooq, the Islamabad government declared the investigation "closed." Some in Congress remained skeptical, however, and a House panel subsequently held a hearing at which three nongovernmental experts urged that U.S. and international investigators be given direct access to Khan, in particular to learn more about ²³⁹ See also CRS Report RL32745, Pakistan's Nuclear Proliferation Activities and the Recommendations of the 9/11 Commission: U.S. Policy Constraints and Options, by Richard P. Cronin, K. Alan Kronstadt, and Sharon Squassoni.

²⁴⁰ "Smugglers Had Design for Advanced Warhead," Washington Post, June 15, 2008; "Nuclear Ring Was More Advanced Than thought, U.N. Says," Washington Post, September 12, 2008.

²⁴¹ Pakistan's Ambassador to the United States later reportedly said that if Khan had not been a national hero, "we would have strung him from the highest tree" ("A 'Worrisome' Time in Pakistan" [interview], USA Today, May 23, 2007).

²⁴² See, for example, Adrian Levy and Catherine Scott-Clark, Deception: Pakistan, the United States, and the Secret Trade in Nuclear Weapons (Walker & Company, 2007).

²⁴³ "Pakistani Says Army Knew Atomic Parts Were Shipped," Associated Press, July 5, 2008.

assistance given to Iran's nuclear program. Some analysts even claim that Iran's strides in uranium enrichment and the related international crisis are almost wholly attributable to Khan's past assistance to Tehran's nuclear program.²⁴⁴ No alleged Pakistani participants have faced criminal charges in the case.

In 2007, a London-based think tank released a report on the Khan network, finding that "at least some of Khan's associates appear to have escaped law enforcement attention and could, after a period of lying low, resume their black-market business." Shortly after, a House panel held another hearing on the Khan network; several Members and nongovernmental expert witnesses again called for Pakistan to allow direct access to Khan for U.S. investigators.²⁴⁵

In July 2007, Islamabad reportedly eased house arrest restrictions on Khan, although the Foreign Ministry denied any change in Khan's status. A Foreign Ministry spokesman in April 2008 said no foreign countries were seeking access to Khan as, internationally, the issue is "a closed chapter." In May 2008, Khan reneged on his 2004 confession, saying its "false allegations" were made only under pressure from the Musharraf government. In July, the new, civilian-led government relaxed travel and communications restrictions on Khan even as it persuaded a judge to bar Khan from speaking about nuclear proliferation.²⁴⁶ The U.S. government remains "very concerned" about Khan's smuggling network. A high-ranking U.S. intelligence official has called the security of Pakistan's nuclear weapons a "number one" worry for the United States that is tracked as a continuing high priority.²⁴⁷

Major New Plutonium Facilities?

Revelations in 2006 that Pakistan is constructing a major heavy water nuclear reactor at the Khushab complex brought a flurry of concern from analysts who foresee a regional competition in fissile material production, perhaps including China. A subsequent report identified a third plutonium production reactor at Khushab. Upon completion, which could be many years away, two new reactors with combined 1,000-megawatt capacity might boost Pakistan's weapons-grade plutonium production capabilities to more than 200 kilograms per year, or enough for up to 50 nuclear weapons. Moreover, a 2007 report warned that Pakistan may soon be reprocessing weapons-grade plutonium at its Chashma facility, further adding to its potential stockpile and aiding in the development of thermonuclear weapons. While Islamabad does not comment directly on the constructions, government officials there insist that Pakistan will continue to update and consolidate its nuclear program for the purpose of minimum credible deterrence. The Bush Administration responded to the 2006 revelations by claiming it had been aware of Pakistani plans and that it discourages the use of the facilities for military purposes.²⁴⁸

²⁴⁴ Douglas Frantz and Catherine Collins, "Pakistan's Dr. Doom" (op-ed), Los Angeles Times, December 2, 2007.

²⁴⁵ See <http://www.iiss.org/publications/strategic-dossiers/nbm>; "A.Q. Khan's Nuclear Wal-Mart: Out of Business or Under New Management?," Joint Hearing of the House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on the Middle East and South Asia and the Subcommittee on Terrorism, Nonproliferation, and Trade, June 27, 2007.

²⁴⁶ "Atom Expert Restrictions 'Eased,'" BBC News, May 22, 2008; "Khan: Pakistan Claims 'Are False,'" BBC News, May 29, 2008; "US Fears Over A.Q. Khan Nuclear Ring," Financial Times (London), June 15, 2008; "Court Silences Pakistan Nuclear Scientist," Associated Press, July 21, 2008.

²⁴⁷ May 2008 statement at http://www.dni.gov/speeches/20080529_speech.pdf.

²⁴⁸ See <http://www.isis-online.org/publications/southasia/ThirdKhushabReactor.pdf> and <http://www.isis-online.org/publications/southasia/chashma.pdf>; "U.S. Says It Knew Of Pakistani Reactor Plan," Washington Post, July 25, 2006.

Pakistan's Nuclear Transparency and Security

²⁴⁹ During 2006, Islamabad appeared to launch a public relations effort aimed at overcoming the stigma caused by Khan's proliferation activities. The effort included dispatching to Washington the chief of the country's Strategic Plans Division, Khalid Kidwai, a retired lieutenant general who attempted to make more transparent Pakistan's nuclear command and control structure, and who acknowledged that Pakistan's past proliferation record had been "poor and indefensible."²⁵⁰

Among the most urgent concerns of U.S. officials has been the security of Pakistan's nuclear weapons and materials, which could be degraded as instability persists. While the danger of Islamist extremist gaining possession of a nuclear explosive device is considered remote, the risk of rogue scientists or security officials seeking to sell nuclear materials and/or technology is seen to be higher in a setting of deteriorating security conditions. Pentagon officials backpedaled from expressions of concern immediately following the November 2007 emergency imposition in Pakistan, saying they believed the country's nuclear arsenal was "under the appropriate control." The United States reportedly has spent nearly $100 million since 2001 on a classified program to help secure Pakistan's strategic weapons. Islamabad claims the amount is closer to $10 million and it emphatically rejects suggestions that the country's nuclear arsenal is anything but fully secure.²⁵¹

Most analysts appear to have concluded that the security of Pakistan's nuclear weapons and facilities is much improved in recent years. Some note that periods of interstate crisis between Pakistan and India can be particularly dangerous in the context of nuclear security, when Pakistan's warheads are more likely to be mobilized and so are outside of their heavily-guarded storage sites.²⁵² More worrisome, many claim, is the possibility that Pakistan's nuclear know-how or technologies could remain prone to leakage.²⁵³ In his February 2008 threat assessment for the Senate Armed Services Committee, Director of National Intelligence McConnell offered the conclusions of the U.S. intelligence community:

We judge the ongoing political transition in Pakistan has not seriously threatened the military's control of the nuclear arsenal, but vulnerabilities exist. The Pakistan Army oversees nuclear programs, including security responsibilities, and we judge that the Army's management of nuclear policy issues—to include physical security—has not been degraded by Pakistan's political crisis.²⁵⁴

Even India's national security advisor—a figure not expected to downplay the dangers—assessed that Pakistan's nuclear arsenal is "largely safe."²⁵⁵ Still, in January 2008, IAEA Director-General

²⁴⁹ See also CRS Report RL34248, Pakistan's Nuclear Weapons: Proliferation and Security Issues.

²⁵⁰ Speech at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, Washington, DC, October 24, 2006.

²⁵¹ "Pakistan's Nuclear Arsenal a U.S. Worry," Los Angeles Times, November 8, 2007; "US Says Not Concerned About Pakistani Nukes," Reuters, November 14, 2007; "U.S. Secretly Aids Pakistan in Guarding Nuclear Arms," New York Times, November 18, 2007; Pakistani statements at http://www.mofa.gov.pk/Spokesperson/2007/Nov/Spokes_12_11_07.htm and http://www.mofa.gov.pk/Press_Releases/2007/Nov/PR_281_07.htm.

²⁵² Statement of Michael Krepon before the Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs, June 12, 2008.

²⁵³ See, for example, "Political Fallout: The Threat to Pakistan's Nuclear Stability," Jane's Intelligence Review, January 1, 2008.

²⁵⁴ See http://www.dni.gov/testimonies/20080227_testimony.pdf.

²⁵⁵ Farhan Bokhari, "Pakistan's Nuclear Assets—Myths Vs Reality" (op-ed), Tehran Times, December 11, 2007; "Pakistan Nukes Safely Guarded: Narayanan," Hindu (Chennai), December 18, 2007.

Mohammed ElBaradei expressed fear that continued “chaos” could lead to Pakistan’s nuclear weapons falling into the hands of extremist elements. Unsurprisingly, the Islamabad government angrily rejects such fears as unrealistic, but even some Pakistani commentators aver that such warnings should not be dismissed.²⁵⁶

Pakistan reportedly has since 2005 been employing a multilayered system of checks that most prominently includes a Personnel Reliability Program modeled after that used by the United States. The program carefully vets and monitors potential and serving employees at the country’s nuclear facilities with a particular emphasis on religious sentiments. Other aspects include biometric scanners and what Pakistani officials call their indigenously developed versions of Permissive Action Links (PALs), sophisticated locks put on U.S. nuclear weapons to prevent their unauthorized use. The Strategic Plans Division claims that 10,000 soldiers are devoted to the task of guarding the country’s nuclear weapons. Reports of U.S. “war-gaming” scenarios to intervene in Pakistan to secure the country’s nuclear weapons in a crisis suggest that U.S. options are severely limited and that the cooperation of the Pakistani government and military would be crucial to the success of such efforts. Such reports may themselves antagonize Islamabad.²⁵⁷

U.S. Nonproliferation Policy

The United States has long sought to halt or limit the proliferation of nuclear weapons in South Asia. In May 1998, following the Indian and Pakistani nuclear tests, President Clinton imposed full restrictions on all non-humanitarian aid to both countries as mandated under Section 102 of the Arms Export Control Act. However, Congress and the President acted almost immediately to lift certain aid restrictions and, in October 2001, all remaining nuclear-related sanctions on Pakistan (and India) were removed. Officially, the United States has continued to urge Pakistan and India to join the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty (NPT) as non-nuclear weapon states and it offers no official recognition of their nuclear weapons capabilities, which exist outside of the international nonproliferation regime.

During the latter years of the Clinton Administration, the United States set forth nonproliferation “benchmarks” for Pakistan and India, including halting further nuclear testing and signing and ratifying the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty (CTBT); halting fissile material production and pursuing Fissile Material Control Treaty negotiations; refraining from deploying nuclear weapons and testing ballistic missiles; and restricting any and all exportation of nuclear materials or technologies. The results of U.S. efforts were mixed, at best, and neither Pakistan nor India are signatories to the CTBT or the NPT. The Bush Administration quickly set aside the benchmark framework. However, concerns about onward proliferation, fears that Pakistan could become destabilized by the U.S.-led counterterrorism efforts in Afghanistan, and concern over the issue of political succession in Islamabad have heightened U.S. attention to weapons proliferation in the region. Some Members of Congress have identified “contradictions” in U.S. nonproliferation policy toward South Asia, particularly as related to the Senate’s rejection of the CTBT and indications that the United States seeks to build new nuclear weapons. Section 1601 of the ²⁵⁶ “Pakistan Rejects IAEA Chief’s Concerns,” United Press International, January 9, 2008; “Why is the World Scared of Pakistan?” (editorial), Daily Times, January 10, 2008.

²⁵⁷ “Inside Pakistan’s Drive to Guard It’s A-Bombs,” Wall Street Journal, November 29, 2007; “Pakistan Says Its Nuclear Assets Are Safe From Militants,” Associated Press, January 26, 2008; “Calculating the Risks in Pakistan,” Washington Post, December 2, 2007.

Foreign Relations Authorization Act of FY2003 (P.L. 107-228) outlined congressionally mandated U.S. nonproliferation objectives for Pakistan and India.²⁵⁸

Pakistan-India Tensions and the Kashmir Issue

In the interests of regional stability, the United States strongly encourages an ongoing Pakistan-India peace initiative and remains concerned about the potential for long-standing disagreements to cause open hostilities between these two nuclear-armed countries. Relations between Pakistan and India remain deadlocked on the issue of Kashmiri sovereignty, and a separatist rebellion has been underway in the region since 1989. Tensions were extremely high in the wake of the Kargil conflict of 1999, when an incursion by Pakistani soldiers led to a bloody six-week-long battle. Throughout 2000 and 2001, cross-border firing and shelling caused scores of both military and civilian deaths. A July 2001 Pakistan-India summit meeting failed to produce even a joint statement, reportedly due to pressure from hardliners on both sides. Major stumbling blocks were India's refusal to acknowledge the "centrality of Kashmir" to future talks and Pakistan's objection to references to "cross-border terrorism."

The 2002 Crisis

Secretary of State Powell visited South Asia in October 2001 in an effort to ease escalating tensions over Kashmir, but a bombing at the Jammu and Kashmir state assembly building later that month was followed by a December assault on the Indian Parliament in New Delhi (both incidents were blamed on Pakistan-based terrorist groups). India mobilized some 700,000 troops along the Pakistan-India frontier and threatened war unless Islamabad ended all "cross-border infiltration" of Islamic militants. This action triggered a corresponding Pakistani military mobilization. Under significant international diplomatic pressure (and likely also the threat of India's use of force), President Musharraf in January 2002 gave a landmark address in which he vowed to end the presence of terrorist entities on Pakistani soil, and he outlawed five militant groups, including those most often named in attacks in India: Lashkar-e-Taiba and Jaish-e-Mohammed.²⁵⁹

Despite the Pakistani pledge, infiltrations into Indian-held Kashmir continued, and a May 2002 terrorist attack on an Indian army base at Kaluchak killed 34, most of them women and children. This event again brought Pakistan and India to the brink of full-scale war, and caused Islamabad to recall army troops from patrol operations along the Pakistan-Afghanistan border. Intensive international diplomatic missions to South Asia reduced tensions during the summer of 2002 and ²⁵⁸ These include continuation of a nuclear testing moratorium; commitments not to deploy nuclear weapons; commitments not to deploy ballistic missiles that can carry nuclear weapons and to restrain the ranges and types of missiles developed or deployed; agreement by both governments to bring their export controls in accord with the guidelines and requirements of the Nuclear Suppliers Group and other international guidelines; establishment of a modern, effective systems to control the export of sensitive dual-use items related to WMD; and the conduct of bilateral meetings between senior Pakistani and Indian officials to discuss security issues and establish confidence-building measures with respect to nuclear policies and programs. The act also makes it the policy of the United States to encourage and work with the Pakistani and Indian governments to establish "effective systems to protect and secure their nuclear devices and materiel from unauthorized use, accidental employment, or theft" (without recognizing those countries as nuclear weapon states as defined in the NPT).

²⁵⁹ Text at <http://www.presidentofpakistan.gov.pk/FilesSpeeches/Addresses/1020200475758AMword%20file.pdf>.

appeared to have prevented the outbreak of war. Numerous top U.S. officials were involved in the effort and strenuously urged the two countries to renew bilateral dialogue.²⁶⁰

The Most Recent Peace Process

Pakistan and India began full military draw-downs in October 2002 and, after a cooling-off period, a “hand of friendship” offer to Pakistan by the Indian prime minister in April 2003 led to the restoration of full diplomatic relations. Yet surging separatist violence that summer contributed to an exchange of sharp rhetoric between Pakistani and Indian leaders at the United Nations, casting doubt on the nascent peace effort. A new confidence-building initiative got Pakistan and India back on a positive track, and a November 2003 cease-fire was initiated after a proposal by Pakistani Prime Minister Z.K. Jamali. President Musharraf later suggested that Pakistan might be willing to “set aside” its long-standing demand for a plebiscite in Kashmir, a proposal welcomed by the United States, but called a “disastrous shift” in policy by Pakistani opposition parties.

Although militant infiltration did not end, New Delhi acknowledged that it was significantly decreased and, combined with other confidence-building measures, relations were sufficiently improved that the Indian prime minister attended a January 2004 summit meeting of the South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation in Islamabad. There Pakistan and India issued a joint “Islamabad Declaration” calling for a renewed “Composite Dialogue” to bring about “peaceful settlement of all bilateral issues, including Jammu and Kashmir, to the satisfaction of both sides.”²⁶¹ A major confidence-building development came in April 2005, when a new bus service was launched linking Muzaffarabad in Pakistani Kashmir and Srinagar in Indian Kashmir, and a summit meeting produced an agreement to address the Kashmir issue “in a forward looking manner for a final settlement.” Still, many Kashmiris reject any settlement process that excludes them.

Even as the normalization of India-Pakistan relations moves forward—and likely in reaction to their apparent marginalization in the face of this development—separatist militants have continued their attacks, and many observers in both India and the United States believe support for Kashmiri militants remains Pakistani state policy. Yet many indicators show positive long-term trends. Steadily reduced rates of infiltration may be attributed to the endurance of the Pakistan-India dialogue. Moreover, President Musharraf made notable efforts to exhibit flexibility, including late 2006 statements that Pakistan is “against independence” for Kashmir, and his offering of a four-point proposal that would lead to “self-governance ... falling between autonomy and independence.”²⁶² This was seen by many analysts as being roughly in line with New Delhi’s Kashmir position. Indeed, the Indian prime minister welcomed Musharraf’s proposals. Prospects for a government-to-government accommodation may thus be improved. However, political and security crises in Pakistan slowed the process in 2007. Following the seating of a new civilian government in Islamabad in early 2008, dialogue resume in May.

²⁶⁰ See Polly Nayak and Michael Krepon, “US Crisis Management in South Asia’s Twin Peaks Crisis” at <http://www.stimson.org/southasia/pdf/USCrisisManagement.pdf>.

²⁶¹ http://www.indianembassy.org/press_release/2004/jan/07.htm.

²⁶² “Pakistani Says Concessions Could Produce Kashmir Pact,” New York Times, December 6, 2006.

Baluchistan Unrest

Pakistan's vast southwestern Baluchistan province is about the size of California and accounts for 44% of the country's land area, but only 5% of its population. The U.S. military has made use of bases in the region to support its operations in neighboring Afghanistan. The province is the proposed setting for a pipeline that would deliver Iranian natural gas to both Pakistan and India, a project which, if brought to fruition, could bring hundreds of millions of dollars in annual transit fees to Islamabad's national treasury, but conflict in Baluchistan reduces the appeal to investors of building a pipeline across the province. The presence in Baluchistan of Jundallah, a trans-border militant group that claims to fight on behalf of Baloch rights, has caused friction between Islamabad and Tehran. More broadly, such problems raise serious questions about Pakistan's internal stability and national cohesion.²⁶³

Over the decades of Pakistani independence, many of the ethnic Baloch and some of the Pashtun tribes who inhabit this relatively poor and underdeveloped province have engaged in armed conflict with federal government forces, variously seeking more equitable returns on the region's rich natural resources, greater autonomy under the country's federal system, or even outright independence and formation of a Baloch state that might include ethnic brethren and some territories of both Afghanistan and Iran. Non-Baloch (mostly Punjabis) have been seen to benefit disproportionately from provincial mineral and energy extraction projects, and indigenous Baloch were given only a small role in the construction of a major new port at Gwadar. Many Baloch thus complain of being a marginalized group in their own homeland. Long-standing resentments sparked armed conflicts in 1948, 1958, and 1973. The latter insurrection, which lasted four years, involved tens of thousands of armed guerillas and brought much destruction to the province; it was put down only after a major effort by the Pakistan Army, which made use of combat helicopters provided by Iran. Some 8,000 rebels and Pakistani soldiers were killed.

The Current Conflict

Mid-2004 saw an increase in hit-and-run attacks on army outposts and in the sabotage of oil and gas pipelines. The alleged rape of a Baloch doctor by Pakistani soldiers in 2005 sparked provincial anger and a major spike in separatist violence over the course of the year. In December of that year, rockets were fired at a Baluchistan army camp during a visit to the site by President Musharraf. A Baloch separatist group claimed responsibility and the Pakistani military began major offensive operations to destroy the militants' camps. In the midst of increasingly heavy fighting in January 2006, Musharraf openly accused India of arming and financing militants fighting in Baluchistan. New Delhi categorically rejected the allegations. U.N. and other international aid groups soon suspended their operations in Baluchistan due to security concerns. Shortly after, Baloch militants shot and killed three Chinese engineers and their Pakistani driver, causing disruption in Islamabad-Beijing relations.

Fighting waned in the middle of 2006, with hundreds of rebels surrendering in return for amnesty. The main rebel tribal leader and onetime Baluchistan chief minister, 79-year-old Nawab Akbar Bugti, had gone into hiding and was believed cut off from his own forces. In August, Bugti was located in a cave hideout and was killed by Pakistan army troops in a battle that left dozens of soldiers and rebels dead. Recognizing Bugti's popularity among wide segments of the Baloch populace and of the potential for his killing to provide martyr status, government officials denied the tribal leader had been targeted. Nevertheless, news of his death spurred major unrest across the province and beyond, with hundreds of arrests in the midst of large-scale street demonstrations. Bugti's killing was criticized across the spectrum of Pakistani politicians and analysts, with some commentators calling it a Pakistani Army miscue of historic proportions.²⁶⁴ Days of rioting included numerous deaths and injuries, but the more dire predictions of spreading unrest and perhaps even the disintegration of Pakistan's federal system did not come to pass. By October 2006, Pakistan's interior minister was claiming a "normalization" and decrease in violence in Baluchistan, although a low-intensity insurgency continued and the overarching problem remained unresolved.²⁶⁵

²⁶³ See "Simmering Balochistan," Jane's Islamic Affairs Analyst, March 1, 2008.

President Musharraf called Baloch rebels "miscreants" and "terrorists;" the Islamabad government officially banned the separatist Baluchistan Liberation Army as a terrorist organization in 2006 and at times suggests that Baloch militants are religious extremists. Yet most rebel attacks are taken against military and infrastructure targets, and—despite an apparent government campaign to link the two movements—Islam appears to play little or no role as a motive for Baloch militancy.²⁶⁶ Pakistan's new civilian dispensation has undertaken some efforts to peacefully resolve the Baluchistan dispute. In May 2008, the Islamabad government freed a Baloch nationalist leader and former provincial chief minister, Akhtar Mengal, who had been imprisoned for two years. The move was seen as a peace gesture toward the troubled province. Yet major mid-2008 skirmishes between Baloch militants and security forces left several dozen people dead, and subsequent reports suggest that the government has failed to keep promises made to the Baloch people, dashing expectations and leaving the troubled province even less secure.²⁶⁷

Narcotics²⁶⁸

In September 2008, President Bush again named Pakistan (along with both Afghanistan and India) among the world's 20 "major drug transit or major illicit drug producing" countries."²⁶⁹ Pakistan is a major transit country for opiates that are grown and processed in Afghanistan then distributed worldwide by Pakistan-based traffickers. The State Department indicates that Pakistan's cooperation on drug control "remains strong," and the Islamabad government has made impressive strides in eradicating indigenous opium poppy cultivation. However, the Department's most recent International Narcotics Control Strategy Report (issued March 2008) asserted that "the imperative of combating militants in the FATA diverted resources and political attention away from Pakistan's goal of returning to a poppy-free status and Pakistan saw an increase of poppy cultivation in 2007." It also expressed concern that Pakistan's long-anticipated Master Drug Control Plan, expected in early 2007, is yet to be approved.²⁷⁰

²⁶⁴ "Bugti's Killing Is the Biggest Blunder Since Bhutto's Execution" (editorial), Daily Times (Lahore), August 28, 2006.

²⁶⁵ See also "Pakistan: The Forgotten Conflict in Balochistan," International Crisis Group Asia Briefing No. 69, October 22, 2007.

²⁶⁶ "Musharraf Sees Foreign Hand in Baluchistan Insurgency," Dawn (Karachi), August 5, 2008; Frederic Grare, "Pakistan: The Resurgence of Baluch Nationalism," Carnegie Paper No. 65, January 2006.

²⁶⁷ "Pakistani Court Frees Musharraf Opponent," Agence France -Presse, May 9, 2008; "No Country for Peace," Herald (Karachi), October 2008.

²⁶⁸ See also CRS Report RL32686, Afghanistan: Narcotics and U.S. Policy.

²⁶⁹ See <http://www.state.gov/p/inl/rls/prsr/ps/109777.htm>.

²⁷⁰ See <http://www.state.gov/p/inl/rls/nrcrpt/2008/vol1/html/100779.htm>.

Opium production spiked in post-Taliban Afghanistan and is at all-time high, supplying more than 90% of the world's heroin.²⁷¹ Elements of Pakistan's intelligence agency are suspected of past involvement in drug trafficking; in 2003, a former U.S. Ambassador to Pakistan told a House panel that their role in the heroin trade from 1997-2003 was "substantial."²⁷² The State Department finds no evidence that the Islamabad government or any of its senior officials are complicit in narcotics trafficking, but concedes that low government salaries and endemic societal corruption contribute to lower-level complicity.²⁷³ The Pakistani criminal network involved in production, processing, and trafficking is described as being "enormous, highly motivated, profit-driven, ruthless, and efficient." Taliban militants are reported to benefit significantly by taxing Afghan farmers and extorting traffickers.²⁷⁴ Other reports indicate that profits from drug sales are financing the activities of Islamic extremists in Pakistan and Kashmir.

U.S. counternarcotics programs aim to assist Pakistan in fortifying its borders and coast against drug trafficking and terrorism, support expanded regional cooperation, encourage Pakistani efforts to eliminate poppy cultivation, and inhibit further cultivation. The United States also aims to increase the interdiction of narcotics from Afghanistan. Islamabad's own counternarcotics efforts are hampered by lack of full government commitment, scarcity of funds, poor infrastructure, and likely corruption. Since 2002, the State Department's Bureau of International Narcotics and Law Enforcement Affairs has supported Pakistan's Border Security Project by training border forces, establishing border outposts, providing vehicles and surveillance and communications equipment, transferring helicopters and fixed-wing aircraft to the Interior Ministry's Air Wing, and road-building in western tribal areas. Congress funded such programs with roughly $22 million in FY2008.

Islamization, Anti-American Sentiment, and Madrassas

With some 160 million citizens, Pakistan is the world's second-most populous Muslim country, and the nation's very foundation grew from a perceived need to create a homeland for South Asian Muslims in the wake of decolonization. However, religious-based political parties traditionally have fared poorly in national elections. An unexpected outcome of the country's 2002 polls saw the Muttahida Majlis-e-Amal (MMA or United Action Front), a coalition of six Islamic parties, win 11% of the popular vote. It also gained control of the provincial assembly in the North West Frontier Province (NWFP) and led a coalition in the Baluchistan assembly. These Pashtun-majority western provinces border Afghanistan, where U.S.-led counterterrorism operations are ongoing. In 2003, the NWFP provincial assembly passed a Shariat (Islamic law) bill. In both 2005 and 2006, the same assembly passed a Hasba (accountability) bill that many fear could create a parallel Islamic legal body. Pakistan's Supreme Court, responding to petitions by President Musharraf's government, rejected most of this legislation as unconstitutional, but in 2007 it upheld most of a modified Hasba bill re-submitted by the NWFP assembly. Such developments alarm Pakistan's moderates and Musharraf himself has decried any attempts to ²⁷¹ United Nations, World Drug Report 2007. See also "Is Afghanistan a Narco-State?," New York Times, July 27, 2008.

²⁷² Statement of Amb. Wendy Chamberlain before the House International Relations Subcommittee on Asia and the Pacific, March 20, 2003.

²⁷³ See <http://www.state.gov/p/inl/rls/nrcrpt/2008/vol1/html/100779.htm>.

²⁷⁴ "Security: Pakistan," Jane's Sentinel Security Assessments, March 5, 2008; "Taliban Reaping Opium Profits," Associated Press, April 11, 2007.

“Talibanize” regions of Pakistan.²⁷⁵ The Islamist coalition was ousted from power in Peshawar and suffered major electoral losses nationwide when February 2008 polls saw the secular Pashtun nationalist Awami National Party take over the NWFP government.

Pakistan’s Islamists are notable for expressions of anti-American sentiment, at times calling for “jihad” against the existential threat to Pakistani sovereignty they believe alliance with Washington entails. Most analysts contend that two December 2003 attempts to assassinate President Musharraf were carried out by Islamist militants angered by Pakistan’s post-September 2001 policy shift. The “Pakistani Taliban” that has emerged in western tribal areas has sought to impose bans on television and CD players, and has instigated attacks on girls schools and nongovernmental organization-operated clinics, obstructing efforts to improve female health and education. Some observers identify a causal link between the poor state of Pakistan’s public education system and the persistence of xenophobia and religious extremism in that country.

Anti-American sentiment is not limited to Islamic groups, however. Many across the spectrum of Pakistani society express anger at U.S. global foreign policy, in particular when such policy is perceived to be unfriendly or hostile to the Muslim world (as in, for example, Palestine and Iraq).²⁷⁶ In 2004 testimony before a Senate panel, a senior U.S. expert opined: “Pakistan is probably the most anti-American country in the world right now, ranging from the radical Islamists on one side to the liberals and Westernized elites on the other side.”²⁷⁷ In a 2005 interview, President Musharraf conceded that “the man on the street [in Pakistan] does not have a good opinion of the United States.” He added, by way of partial explanation, that Pakistan had been “left high and dry” after serving as a strategic U.S. ally during the 1980s. When asked about anti-American sentiment in Pakistan during his maiden July 2008 visit to the United States as head of government, Prime Minister Gillani offered that the impression in Pakistan is that “America wants war.”²⁷⁸

A Pew poll taken shortly before Pakistan’s catastrophic October 2005 earthquake found only 23% of Pakistanis expressing a favorable view of the United States, the lowest percentage for any country surveyed. That percentage doubled to 46% in an ACNielsen poll taken after large-scale U.S. disaster relief efforts in earthquake-affected areas, with the great majority of Pakistanis indicating that their perceptions had been positively influenced by witnessing such efforts. However, a January 2006 missile attack on Pakistani homes near the Afghan border killed numerous civilians and was blamed on U.S. forces, renewing animosity toward the United States among segments of the Pakistani populace. Another noteworthy episode in 2006 saw Pakistani cities hosting major public demonstrations against the publication in European newspapers of cartoons deemed offensive to Muslims. These protests, which were violent at times, included strong anti-U.S. and anti-Musharraf components, suggesting that Islamist organizers used the issue to forward their own political ends. Subsequently, a June 2006 Pew Center poll found only 27% of Pakistanis holding a favorable opinion of the United States, and this dropped to 19% in a ²⁷⁵ In a late 2007 public opinion survey, 48% of Pakistani respondents completely agreed that “religion and government should be separate,” up from only 33% in 2002 (see <http://pewglobal.org/reports/pdf/258.pdf>).

²⁷⁶ Author interviews in Islamabad, September 2006.

²⁷⁷ Statement of Stephen Cohen before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, July 14, 2004. More than three years later, country expert Lisa Curtis warned a House panel about “the increasingly shrill anti-Americanism that is gripping Pakistani civil society” (statement before the House Armed Services Committee, October 10, 2007).

²⁷⁸ “10 Questions for Pervez Musharraf,” Time, October 3, 2005; “A Conversation With Yousaf Raza Gillani,” Council on Foreign Relations transcript, July 29, 2008.

September 2007 survey by the U.S.-based group Terror Free Tomorrow, suggesting that public diplomacy gains following the 2005 earthquake had receded.

In January 2008, the University of Maryland-based Program on International Policy Attitudes released a survey of public opinion in Pakistan. The findings indicated that significant resentment toward and distrust of the United States persist among large segments of the Pakistani public:

- 64% of Pakistanis did not trust the United States to “do the right thing in world affairs;”
- more than two-thirds believed the U.S. military presence in Afghanistan is “a critical threat to Pakistan’s interests;”
- only 27% felt that Pakistan-U.S. security cooperation has benefitted Pakistan; and
- 86% believed that weakening and dividing the Muslim world is a U.S. goal (70% believe this is “definitely” the case).²⁷⁹

A public opinion poll conducted in June 2008 found nearly two-thirds of Pakistanis agreeing that religious extremism represented a serious problem for their country, yet less than one-third supported Pakistani army operations against religious militants in western Pakistan, and a scant 15% thought Pakistan should cooperate with the United States in its “war on terror.” A late 2008 Gallup survey found only one in seven Pakistanis holding the opinion that such counterterrorism cooperation has benefitted their country.²⁸⁰

Pakistan’s Religious Schools (Madrassas)²⁸¹

Afghanistan’s Taliban movement itself began among students attending Pakistani religious schools (madrassas). Among the more than 15,000 madrassas training some 1.5 million children in Pakistan are a small percentage that have been implicated in teaching militant anti-Western, anti-American, anti-Hindu, and even anti-Shia values. Former Secretary of State Powell once identified these as “programs that do nothing but prepare youngsters to be fundamentalists and to be terrorists.”²⁸² Contrary to popularly held conceptions, however, research indicates that the great majority of Pakistan’s violent Islamist extremists does not emerge from the country’s madrassas, but rather from the dysfunctional public school system or even from private, English-medium schools. One study found that less than one in five international terrorists sampled had Islamic education backgrounds.²⁸³ However, a senior leader of the secular Awami National Party that now leads a coalition government in the North West Frontier Province said in mid-2008 that

²⁷⁹ See http://www.worldpublicopinion.org/pipa/pdf/jan08/Pakistan_Jan08_rpt.pdf.

²⁸⁰ See <http://www.iri.org/mena/pakistan/2008-07-16-Pakistan.asp>; <http://www.gallup.com/poll/110926/Few-Pakistanis-Perceive-Benefits-From-Alliance-US.aspx>.

²⁸¹ See also CRS Report RS22009, Education Reform in Pakistan, by K. Alan Kronstadt, and CRS Report RS21654, Islamic Religious Schools, Madrasas: Background, by Christopher M. Blanchard.

²⁸² Statement before the House Appropriations Committee, March 10, 2004.

²⁸³ Marc Sageman, Understanding Terror Networks (University of Pennsylvania Press, 2004). See also Mariam Abou Zahab and Olivier Roy, Islamist Networks (Columbia University Press, 2004); Peter Bergen and Swati Pandney, “The Madrassa Myth,” New York Times, June 14, 2005.

many Pakistani madrassas encourage militancy and are breeding grounds for terrorism. He appealed to international donors to help Pakistan establish modern educational institutions.²⁸⁴

Many of Pakistan's madrassas are financed and operated by Pakistani Islamist political parties such as the JUI-F (closely linked to the Taliban), as well as by multiple unknown foreign entities, many in Saudi Arabia.²⁸⁵ As many as two-thirds of the seminaries are run by the Deobandi sect, known in part for traditionally anti-Shia sentiments and at times linked to the Sipah-e-Sahaba terrorist group. In its 2007 report on international religious freedom, the U.S. State Department said, "Some unregistered and Deobandi-controlled madrassas in the FATA and northern Baluchistan continued to teach extremism" and that schools run by the Jamaat al-Dawat, considered to be a front organization of the proscribed Lashkar-e-Taiba terrorist group, serve as recruitment centers for extremists. President Musharraf himself has acknowledged that a small number of seminaries were "harboring terrorists" and he has asked religious leaders to help isolate these by openly condemning them.²⁸⁶

Global attention to Pakistan's religious schools intensified during the summer of 2005 after Pakistani officials acknowledged that suspects in London terrorist bombings visited Pakistan during the previous year and may have spent time at a madrassa near Lahore. While the Islamabad government repeatedly has pledged to crack down on the more extremist madrassas in his country, there continues to be little concrete evidence that it has done so.²⁸⁷ Some observers speculate that President Musharraf's alleged reluctance to enforce reform efforts was rooted in his desire to remain on good terms with Pakistan's Islamist political parties, which were seen to be an important part of his political base.²⁸⁸ When asked in late 2007 about progress in reforming the country's madrassa system, Musharraf made a rare admission of "lack of achievement," but went on to call the registration campaign and efforts to mainstream the curriculum successful.²⁸⁹

A key aspect of madrassas' enduring appeal to Pakistani parents is the abysmal state of the country's public schools. Pakistan's primary education system ranks among the world's least effective. Congress, the Bush Administration, and the 9/11 Commission each have identified this issue as relevant to U.S. interests in South Asia. In the lead-up to Pakistan's February 2008 elections, 16 of the country's major parties committed to raising the federal education budget to 4% of GDP, up from the current 2.4%. The U.S. Congress has appropriated many millions of dollars to assist Pakistan in efforts to reform its education system, including changes that would make madrassa curriculum closer in substance to that provided in non-religious schools. About $256 million has been allocated for education-related aid programs since 2002. In 2006, the U.S.-

²⁸⁴ "Pak Madrassas Breeding Ground for Militants: Pak Leader," Press Trust of India, June 1, 2008.

²⁸⁵ P.W. Singer, "Pakistan's Madrassahs: Ensuring a System of Education Not Jihad," Brookings Institution Analysis Paper 14, November 2001; Ali Riaz, "Global Jihad, Sectarianism, and the Madrassahs in Pakistan," Institute of Defence and Strategic Studies, Singapore, August 2005.

²⁸⁶ See <http://www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/irf/2007/90233.htm>; "Some Madrassas Bad: Musharraf," Daily Times (Lahore), September 8, 2004.

²⁸⁷ See "Pakistan: Reforming the Education Sector," International Crisis Group Report 84, October 7, 2004; "Radical Teachings in Pakistan Schools," Boston Globe, September 29, 2006. Author interviews with Pakistani government officials and scholars tend to confirm that movement on madrassa reform is slow, at best.

²⁸⁸ "At an Islamic School, Hints of Extremist Ties," Washington Post, June 13, 2004; Vali Nasr, "Military Rule, Islamism, and Democracy in Pakistan," Middle East Journal 58, 2, Spring 2004.

²⁸⁹ "Full Transcript Musharraf Interview," ABC News (online), November 30, 2007. As of January 2008, more than 14,600 madrassas were reportedly registered with the government, leaving up to 1,500 yet to register ("Madrassah Reforms Put on Hold for Next Government," Dawn (Karachi), January 12, 2008).

Pakistan Education dialogue was launched in Washington to bolster further engagement. In April 2008, USAID launched a new $90 million project to bolster the effectiveness of Pakistan's public education sector. Requested funding for FY2009 includes a total of $166 million for basic and higher education programs in Pakistan.²⁹⁰

Democratization and Human Rights

Democracy and Governance²⁹¹

The status and development of Pakistan's democratic institutions are key U.S. policy concerns, especially among those analysts who view representative government in Islamabad as being a prerequisite for reducing religious extremism and establishing a moderate Pakistani state. There had been hopes that the October 2002 national elections would reverse Pakistan's historic trend toward unstable governance and military interference in democratic institutions. Such hopes were eroded by ensuing developments, including President Musharraf's imposition of major constitutional changes and his retention of the position of army chief. International and Pakistani human rights groups continued to issue reports critical of Islamabad's military-dominated government throughout the Musharraf-dominated era. In 2008, and for the ninth straight year, the often-cited Freedom House rated Pakistan as "not free" in the areas of political rights and civil liberties.

Pakistan's Military-Dominated Government, 2002-2008

General Musharraf's assumption of the presidency ostensibly was legitimized by a controversial April 2002 referendum marked by evidence of fraud.²⁹² In August 2002, Musharraf announced sweeping constitutional changes to bolster the president's powers, including provisions for presidential dissolution of the National Assembly. The United States expressed concerns that the changes could make it more difficult to build democratic institutions in Pakistan. The 2002 elections nominally fulfilled Musharraf's promise to restore the National Assembly that was dissolved in the wake of his extra-constitutional seizure of power. The pro-military PML-Q party won a plurality of seats, while a coalition of Islamist parties made a surprisingly strong showing.

The civilian government was hamstrung for more than a year by fractious debate over the legitimacy of constitutional changes and by Musharraf's continued status as army chief and president. A surprise December 2003 agreement between Musharraf and the MMA Islamist opposition ended the deadlock by bringing the constitutional changes before Parliament and by eliciting a promise from Musharraf to resign his military commission before 2005. Non-Islamist opposition parties unified under the Alliance for the Restoration of Democracy (ARD) accused the MMA of betrayal and insisted that the new arrangement merely institutionalized military rule in Pakistan. Further apparent reversals for Pakistani democratization came in 2004, including the sentencing of ARD leader and PML-N stalwart Javed Hashmi to 23 years in prison for sedition, mutiny, and forgery (Hashmi was released in 2007), and the "forced" resignation of Prime ²⁹⁰ See <http://www.usaid.gov/pk/education/index.htm>.

²⁹¹ See also CRS Report RL34240, Pakistan's Political Crises, by K. Alan Kronstadt and CRS Report RL34449, Pakistan's 2008 Elections: Results and Implications for U.S. Policy, by K. Alan Kronstadt.

²⁹² "Pakistan's Musharraf Wins Landslide, Fraud Alleged," Reuters, May 1, 2002.

Minister Jamali for what numerous analysts called his insufficient deference to President Musharraf. Musharraf “shuffled” prime ministers to seat his close ally, Finance Minister Shaukat Aziz. Aziz was seen to be an able financial manager and technocrat favored by the military, but he had no political base in Pakistan. In the final month of 2004 Musharraf chose to continue his role as army chief beyond the stated deadline. Moreover, nominally non-party 2005 municipal elections saw major gains for candidates favored by the PML-Q and notable reversals for Islamists, but were also marked by widespread accusations of rigging. The Bush Administration made no public comment on reported irregularities.

One senior Pakistani scholar offered a critical summary of the country’s political circumstances under President Musharraf’s rule:

[T]he “Musharraf model of governance,” is narrow and suffers from a crisis of legitimacy. Its major features are: a concentration of power in the presidency, with backup from its army/intelligence and bureaucratic affiliates; induction of retired and serving military officers into important civilian institutions and thus an undermining of the latter’s autonomy; co-option of a section of the political elite, who are given a share of power and patronage in return for mobilizing civilian support, on President Musharraf’s terms; a reluctant partnership with the Islamic parties, especially the MMA, and soft-peddling towards Islamic groups; and manipulation of the weak and divided political forces and exclusion of dissident political leaders.²⁹³

Many analysts have opined that, despite being a self-professed “enlightened moderate,” Musharraf in practice strengthened the hand of Pakistan’s Islamist extremist forces and that, despite rhetoric about liberalizing Pakistani society, his choice of political allies suggested he was not serious.²⁹⁴ In the meantime, the Pakistan army further entrenched itself in the country’s corporate sector, generating billions of dollars in annual profits from businesses ranging from construction to breakfast cereal. One estimate has this “milbus” (military business) accounting for fully 6% of the country’s gross domestic product.²⁹⁵

Some observers argue that much of the criticism leveled at President Musharraf was unfair and that he had been a relatively benign “military dictator.” Such analyses will, for example, point out that Musharraf’s policies vis-à-vis India allowed for a reduction of bilateral tensions and an ongoing peace dialogue, that he appeared to have an extent clamped down on Kashmiri militancy, and that he did not come under fire for corruption, as did Bhutto and other civilian leaders.²⁹⁶

During their years of marginalization, the leadership of the country’s leading moderate, secular, and arguably most popular party—the Pakistan People’s Party—sought greater U.S. support for Pakistani democratization and warned that the space in which they were being allowed to operate was so narrow as to bring into question their continued viability as political forces.²⁹⁷ They also typically identify a direct causal link between nondemocratic governance and the persistence of religious militancy in Pakistan. In an opinion piece composed shortly before her 2007 assassination, Benazir Bhutto argued that the all the countries of the world had a direct interest in ²⁹³ Hasan-Askari Rizvi, “Towards a Solution of the Present Crisis” (op-ed), Daily Times (Lahore), June 17, 2007.

²⁹⁴ See, for example, Peter Beinart, “How to Deal with Dictators” (op-ed), Time, July 26, 2007.

²⁹⁵ Ayesha Siddiqi, Military Inc: Inside Pakistan’s Military Economy (Pluto Press, 2007).

²⁹⁶ See, for example, Jonathan Power, “In Defense of Pakistan’s Military Dictator” (op-ed), Toronto Star, January 6, 2008.

²⁹⁷ Author interview with Benazir Bhutto, Washington, DC, February 2006, and with numerous other PPP officials.

Pakistani democratization, reiterating her long-held view that dictatorship had fueled extremism in her country and that credible elections there were a necessary condition for the reduction of religion militancy.²⁹⁸

U.S. policy

While the United States maintains a keen interest in Pakistani democratization, the issue was widely seen as having become a secondary consideration as counterterrorism concerns grew after 2001. As stated by Assistant Secretary of State Boucher in a December 2007 statement before a Senate panel:

The United States wants to see Pakistan succeed in its transition to an elected civilian-led democracy, to become a moderate, democratic, Muslim nation committed to human rights and the rule of law. All of our assistance programs are directed toward helping Pakistan achieve these goals. This is a long-term undertaking that will require years to accomplish.²⁹⁹

Bush Administration officials repeatedly have emphasized that democratization is key to the creation of a more moderate and prosperous Pakistan. However, many critics of Administration policy assert that the Islamabad government was for more than five years given a “free pass” on the issue of representative government, in part as a means of enlisting that country’s continued assistance in U.S.-led counterterrorism efforts.³⁰⁰ U.S. congressional committees long expressed concern with “the slow pace of the democratic development of Pakistan” (S.Rept. 109-96) and “the lack of progress on improving democratic governance and rule of law” there (H.Rept. 109-486). Secretary of State Rice argued that strong U.S. support for Pakistan’s democratization process has been a “very well kept secret,” and she rejected as untrue claims that the U.S. supported a military government in Islamabad without attention to democracy.³⁰¹

Many commentators criticized the Bush Administration’s perceived over-emphasis on relations with President Musharraf and the Pakistani military at the expense of positive ties with the broader Pakistan society. As articulated by a scholar who would later become Pakistan’s Ambassador to Washington,

The United States made a critical mistake in putting faith in one man—General Pervez Musharraf—and one institution—the Pakistani military—as instruments of the U.S. policy to eliminate terrorism and bring stability to the Southwest and South Asia. A robust U.S. policy of engagement with Pakistan that helps in building civilian institutions, including law enforcement capability, and eventually results in reverting Pakistan’s military to its security ²⁹⁸ Benazir Bhutto, “Why the World Needs Democracy in Pakistan,” Christian Science Monitor, December 10, 2007.

²⁹⁹ See <http://www.state.gov/p/sca/rls/rm/2007/96566.htm>.

³⁰⁰ For example, two former senior Clinton Administration officials criticized President Bush for choosing to “back the dictator” rather than offer clear support for democracy and rule of law in Pakistan. They contended that such a policy has damaged U.S. interests in South Asia and in the Muslim world. In late 2007 Senate testimony, one former U.S. diplomat offered that, “Overall U.S. policy toward Pakistan until very recently gave no serious attention to encouraging democracy in Pakistan.” Numerous other former U.S. officials have opined that the Bush Administration’s relatively meager attention to Pakistani democratization has been rooted in an aversion to any moves that could alienate Musharraf and so reduce his cooperation on counterterrorism (Sandy Berger and Bruce Riedel, “America’s Stark Choice” (op-ed), International Herald Tribune, October 9, 2007; Statement of Amb. Teresita Schaffer before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, December 6, 2007; “Democracy Gets Small Portion of U.S. Aid,” Washington Post, January 6, 2008).

³⁰¹ See <http://www.state.gov/secretary/rm/2008/05/104634.htm>.

functions would be a more effective way of strengthening Pakistan and protecting United States policy interests there.³⁰²

The U.S. State Department's Country Report on Human Rights Practices 2006, issued by the Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor in early 2007, did not use the word "democracy" or any of its derivatives in discussing Pakistan, but did note that "restrictions on citizens' right to change their government" represented a "major problem."³⁰³ Leading opposition political figures in Islamabad warned that unconditional U.S. support for Musharraf's military-dominated government contributed to an anti-American backlash among Pakistan's moderate forces. Yet others opine that overt U.S. conditionality is unlikely to be effective and may only foster anti-U.S. resentments in Pakistan.³⁰⁴

Human Rights Problems

Pakistan is the setting for numerous and serious perceived human rights abuses, some of them perpetrated and/or sanctioned by the state. According to the Department of State, the Islamabad government is known to limit freedoms of association, religion, and movement, and to imprison political leaders. The Department's most recent Country Report on Human Rights Practices (issued March 2008) determined that the human rights situation in Pakistan "worsened" during 2007, due primarily to President Musharraf's six-week-long imposition of emergency powers and the attendant suspension of the constitution and dismissal of Supreme and High Provincial Courts. Along with concerns about these anti-democratic practices, the report lists extrajudicial killings, torture, and disappearances; "widespread" government and police corruption; lack of judicial independence; political violence; terrorism; and "extremely poor" prison conditions among the major problems.³⁰⁵ The most recent State Department report on trafficking in persons (issued June 2008) again said, "Pakistan does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so." It again placed Pakistan at "Tier 2" due to Islamabad's "limited efforts to combat trafficking in persons over the last year, particularly in the area of law enforcement."³⁰⁶

In June 2007, the House Appropriations Committee (H.Rept. 110-197) expressed concern about the Pakistani government's apparent lack of respect for human rights. Senate reports have aired similar concerns. The Human Rights Commission of Pakistan and international human rights groups regularly issue reports critical of Pakistan's lack of political freedoms, lawlessness in many areas (especially the western tribal agencies), and of the country's perceived abuses of the rights of women and minorities. For example, in reviewing the country's human rights circumstances, the Lahore-based Joint Action Committee for People's Rights asserted that,

On the one hand policies of Musharraf and his civilian partners have fanned religious extremism and intolerance, sectarian divisions resulting in violence, provincial disharmony that has weakened the federation, and created a climate of impunity that has heightened the ³⁰² Statement of Husain Haqqani before the House Armed Services Committee, October 10, 2007.

³⁰³ See <http://www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/hrrpt/2006/78874.htm>.

³⁰⁴ "US Warned Over Backing for Musharraf," Financial Times (London), June 12, 2007; Lisa Curtis, Statement before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on the Middle East and South Asia, January 16, 2008; Ashley Tellis, "Pakistan: Conflicted Ally in the War on Terror," Carnegie Endowment Policy Brief 56, December 2007.

³⁰⁵ See <http://www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/hrrpt/2007/100619.htm>.

³⁰⁶ See <http://www.state.gov/documents/organization/105501.pdf>.

sense of insecurity in every Pakistani. On the other, their ham-handedness in combating terrorism has resulted in serious violations of human rights and international humanitarian law.

The group strongly urged Pakistan's new civilian government to distinguish itself from the previous regime by promoting and protecting basic human rights.³⁰⁷ That government did in April 2008 ratify or sign three key international human rights conventions, a move lauded by London-based Amnesty International. The move was lauded by international human rights groups even as a lack of judicial independence and continued "disappearances" are identified as ongoing problems.³⁰⁸

Gender Discrimination

Discrimination against females is widespread in Pakistan and traditional constraints—cultural, legal, and spousal—keep women in a subordinate position in society. In 2005, Pakistani gang rape victim Mukhtaran Mai—and Islamabad's (mis)handling of her case—became emblematic of gender discrimination problems in Pakistan. The Hudood Ordinance promulgated during the rule of President General Zia ul-Haq is widely criticized for imposing stringent punishments and restrictions under the guise of Islamic law. Among its provisions, the ordinance criminalizes all extramarital sex and makes it extremely difficult for women to prove allegations of rape (those women who make such charges without the required evidence often are jailed as adulterers). In 2006, the Hudood laws were amended in the Women's Protection Act. President Musharraf supported the changes and the ruling PML-Q party joined with the opposition PPP to overcome fierce resistance by Islamist parties. The step was viewed as a landmark in efforts to create more a moderate Pakistani state. However, in 2008, the State Department, while acknowledging that the Women's Protection Act had improved conditions, noted that rape, domestic violence, and abuse against women, such as honor crimes and discriminatory legislation that affected women, remain serious problems. Reported acts of violence against women more than doubled in Pakistan in 2007 as compared to the previous year.³⁰⁹

Religious Freedom

The State Department's most recent International Religious Freedom Report (issued September 2008) again found that in practice the Islamabad government imposes limits on the freedom of religion in Pakistan:

The Government took some steps to improve its treatment of religious minorities during the period covered by this report, but serious problems remained. Law enforcement personnel abused religious minorities in custody. Security forces and other government agencies did not adequately prevent or address societal abuse against minorities. Discriminatory legislation and the Government's failure to take action against societal forces hostile to those who practice a different faith fostered religious intolerance, acts of violence, and intimidation against religious minorities. Specific laws that discriminate against religious minorities

³⁰⁷ See http://www.unelections.org/files/PakistaniNGOs_LettertoFM_5May08_0.pdf.

³⁰⁸ See <http://www.amnesty.org/en/for-media/press-releases/pakistan-new-government-sends-positive-signal>; <http://hrw.org/english/docs/2008/07/02/pakist19238.htm>.

³⁰⁹ See <http://www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/hrrpt/2007/100619.htm>; "Violence Against Pakistani Women," BBC News, April 15, 2008.

include anti-Ahmadi and blasphemy laws that provide the death penalty for defiling Islam or its prophets.³¹⁰

The State Department has rejected repeated U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom recommendations that Pakistan be designated a “country of particular concern.” The Commission’s most recent annual report (May 2008) asserts that,

[A]ll of the serious religious freedom concerns on which the Commission has reported in the past persist. Sectarian and religiously motivated violence continues, particularly against Shia Muslims, Ahmadis, Christians, and Hindus, and the government’s response continues to be insufficient and not fully effective.

The Commission finds that Pakistani government officials provide the country’s religious minorities with inadequate protections against societal violence.³¹¹

Press Freedom

Press freedom and the safety of journalists recently have become major concerns in Pakistan, spurred especially by the 2006 discovery of the handcuffed body of Pakistani journalist Hayatullah Khan in a rural area of North Waziristan. Khan, who had been missing for more than six months, was abducted by unknown gunmen after he reported on an apparent U.S.-launched missile attack in Pakistan’s tribal region. Khan’s family is among those who suspect the involvement of Pakistani security forces; an official inquiry into the death was launched. Other journalists have been detained and possibly tortured, including a pair reportedly held incommunicado without charges for three months after they shot footage of the Jacobabad airbase that was used by U.S. forces. Paris-based Reporters Without Borders placed Pakistan 152nd out of 169 countries in its most recent annual ranking of world press freedom.³¹²

Pakistani journalists have taken to the streets to protest perceived abuses. In May 2007, the New York-based Committee to Protect Journalists placed Pakistan sixth in a list of the ten countries where press freedom had most deteriorated since 2002.³¹³ In early June, in apparent reaction to media coverage of rallies in support of Pakistan’s suspended Chief Justice, the Musharraf government issued an ordinance allowing the Pakistan Electronic Media Regulatory Agency to impose strict curbs on television and radio station operations. Human Rights Watch later called the decree a “disgraceful assault on media freedom.”³¹⁴ Implementation of the ordinance subsequently was halted. In September 2007, the U.S. Embassy in Islamabad expressed concern about recent incidents in which Pakistani journalists were subject to assaults and harassment.³¹⁵ In its March 2008 human rights report, the State Department asserted that there was an increase in government arrests, harassment, and intimidation of journalists during 2007.³¹⁶

³¹⁰ See <http://www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/irf/2008/108505.htm>.

³¹¹ See <http://www.uscirf.gov>. See also “Tough Times for Pakistan’s Religious Minorities,” Associated Press, January 23, 2008.

³¹² See http://www.rsf.org/article.php3?id_article=24025.

³¹³ See <http://cpj.org/backsliders/index.html>.

³¹⁴ See <http://hrw.org/english/docs/2007/06/06/pakist16084.htm>.

³¹⁵ See <http://usembassy.state.gov/pakistan/h07092101.html>.

³¹⁶ See <http://www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/hrrpt/2007/100619.htm>.

“Disappeared” Persons

According to the U.S. State Department, there was an increase of politically motivated disappearances in Pakistan in 2006 which continued in 2007, with police and security forces holding prisoners incommunicado and refusing to provide information on their whereabouts, particularly in terrorism and national security cases. In late 2006, Pakistan’s Supreme Court ordered the government to disclose the whereabouts of 41 suspected security detainees who had “disappeared.” Human rights groups claim to have recorded more than 400 cases of such secret detentions since 2002.³¹⁷ Amnesty International has criticized Islamabad for human rights abuses related to its cooperation with the U.S.-led “war on terror,” including the arbitrary detention, enforced disappearance, and torture of hundreds of people. In late 2007, Pakistan’s military and intelligence agencies reportedly released from detention nearly 100 terrorism suspects without charges. No official explanation for the releases was offered and some analysts assert that the primary motive was avoiding the embarrassment of having to reveal that the suspects were being held “on flimsy evidence in [a] secret system.”³¹⁸ The Islamabad government formally denies involvement in extralegal detentions. It also has denied that any Pakistani citizens had been remanded to U.S. custody for imprisonment at Guantanamo Bay, saying that any Pakistani nationals held in that facility were arrested outside Pakistan, mostly in Afghanistan.³¹⁹

Economic Issues³²⁰

Overview

Pakistan is a poor country, but the national economy gathered significant positive momentum in the new century, helped in large part by the government’s pro-growth policies and by post-2001 infusions of foreign aid. Overall growth averaged 6.6% from 2002-2007. However, poverty remains widespread, and presently high rates of domestic inflation and a serious balance of payments crisis have many analysts concerned about the country’s macroeconomic stability. Some observers warn that the domestic capacity to sustain growth does not exist. According to the World Bank, nominal GDP per capita in 2007 was only $855, even as poverty rates dropped from 34% to 24% in the first half of the current decade. Severe human losses and property damage from an October 2005 earthquake in northern Pakistan have had limited follow-on economic impact, given a large influx of foreign aid and the stimulus provided by reconstruction efforts.

Pakistan’s political crises in 2007 harmed what had been a generally strong national economy. The country’s main stock market lost nearly 5% of its value when trading opened following the November emergency imposition and the country’s attractiveness for foreign investors almost certainly has suffered with ensuing instability. In the wake of Bhutto’s killing, the market again fell by nearly 5%. Food prices have spiked, contributing to inflationary pressures that have in turn ³¹⁷ “Pakistan: A Land of Systematic Disappearances,” Asian Center for Human Rights, March 28, 2007; “Pakistani Wife Embodies Cause Of ‘Disappeared,’” New York Times, July 19, 2007.

³¹⁸ “Picture of Secret Detentions Emerges in Pakistan,” New York Times, December 19, 2007.

³¹⁹ See http://www.mofa.gov.pk/Spokesperson/2008/Mar/Spokes_12_03_08.htm.

³²⁰ See also CRS Report RS22983, Pakistan’s Capital Crisis: Implications for U.S. Policy, by Michael F. Martin and K. Alan Kronstadt.

sapped exports.³²¹ Rising fuel costs and food subsidies have spurred the new government to order “massive cuts” in federal spending, including that for the military, and to seek $4-5 billion from international lenders to reverse a sharp deterioration on the current account of its balance of payments. Pakistan also faces a shortfall of some 4,000 megawatts of electricity and scheduled blackouts now affect homes and businesses many hours each day.³²²

Despite these negative signs, the long-term economic outlook for Pakistan is improved since 2001, even as it remains clouded in a country still dependent on foreign lending and the importation of basic commodities. Substantial fiscal deficits and dependency on external aid have been chronic (public and external debt equal nearly three-fifths of GDP), counterbalancing a major overhaul of the tax collection system and what have been major gains in the Karachi Stock Exchange, which nearly doubled in value as the world’s best performer in 2002 and was up by 40% in 2007. Along with absolute development gains in recent years, Pakistan’s relative standing has also improved: The U.N. Development Program ranked Pakistan 136th out of 177 countries on its 2007/2008 human development index (between Laos and Bhutan), up from 144th in 2003.³²³

Pakistan’s real GDP grew by 5.8% in the fiscal year ending June 2008, driven by a booming service sector. Output from this and the manufacturing sector has grown substantially since 2002, but the agricultural sector continues to lag considerably (in part due to droughts), slowing overall growth. Agricultural labor accounts for nearly half of the country’s work force, but only about one-fifth of national income and 2% of tax revenue. Expanding textile production and the government’s pro-growth measures had most analysts foreseeing solid expansion ahead, but political and security turmoil in 2008 have caused previously optimistic predictions to drop below 5% for the next two years. A relatively small but rapidly growing entrepreneurial class has boosted the consumption of luxury goods.³²⁴

Pakistan stabilized its external debt at about $33 billion by 2003, but this rose to about $46 billion in 2008. Still, such debt is less than one-third of GDP today, down from more than one-half in 2000. The country’s reported total liquid reserves reached $13.7 billion by May 2007, an all-time high and a nearly five-fold increase since 1999, but were rapidly depleted in 2008. Foreign remittances have exceeded $4 billion annually since 2003 (at around $5.5 billion in FY2006/2007), up from slightly more than $1 billion in 2001. High oil prices and high food commodity prices have driven inflationary pressures, resulting in year-on-year consumer rates above 25% in August 2008. Inflationary pressures are projected to remain strong into 2009; many analysts call rising prices the single most important obstacle to future growth. Pakistan’s resources and comparatively well-developed entrepreneurial skills may hold promise for more rapid economic growth and development in coming years. This is particularly true for the country’s textile industry, which accounts for two-thirds of all exports (and up to 90% of exports to the United States).

³²¹ “Pakistan Stocks Tumble Amid Violence,” Associated Press, December 31, 2007; “Fear Stalks Pakistani Business After Bhutto’s Murder,” Reuters, January 2, 2008; “As Pakistan Churns, Economy Takes Hit,” Wall Street Journal, February 4, 2008; “Price of Pakistan’s Economic Woes,” BBC News, April 14, 2008.

³²² “Pakistan Orders Public Spending Cuts,” Financial Times (London), May 8, 2008; “Pakistan Battles Power Shortages,” BBC News, May 15, 2008.

³²³ See <http://hdr.undp.org/en/reports/global/hdr2007-2008>.

³²⁴ “Modern and Muslim: In Turbulent Pakistan, Start-Ups Drive a Boom,” Wall Street Journal, September 5, 2007.

Analysts press for further broadening the country's tax base in order to provide increased revenue for investment in improved infrastructure, health, and education, all prerequisites for economic development. Political insecurity appears to fuel a patronage system of excessive spending without sufficient revenue enhancement efforts.³²⁵ Serious environmental degradation also retards growth: a 2007 World Bank report conservatively estimated that at least 6% of Pakistan's GDP is lost to illness and premature mortality caused by air pollution (both outdoor and indoor); diseases caused by inadequate water supplies, sanitation, and hygiene; and reduced agricultural productivity due to soil degradation.³²⁶

Attempts at macroeconomic reform historically have floundered due to political instability, but the Musharraf government had notable successes in effecting such reform. Rewards for participation in the post-September 2001 anti-terror coalition eased somewhat Pakistan's severe national debt situation, with many countries, including the United States, boosting bilateral assistance efforts and large amounts of external aid flowing into the country. According to the Asian Development Bank's Outlook 2008:

Improved economic fundamentals have enhanced the resilience of the economy and helped it absorb shocks, including higher global oil prices and 2005's devastating earthquake. But growth has generated a heavy imbalance in the external current account, which could affect economic momentum. The current account deficit has been financed largely by strong incoming foreign investment. External sources have also been employed, increasingly, to finance the fiscal deficit. Issues of long-term sustainability therefore arise, especially in a context of high global oil and commodity prices and domestic political uncertainties.³²⁷

A 2008 report from the World Bank urged major efforts to strengthen Pakistan's water, power, and transport infrastructure, finding that major inefficiencies were costing the country several percentage points in economic growth each year.

Even as the bulk of criticism of President Musharraf has focused on the authoritarian aspects of his rule, many ordinary Pakistanis were unhappy with his government's economic policies, which were seen to have benefitted only a fraction of the country's people. Pakistan's new government took office in early 2008 lambasting the Musharraf regime's alleged mismanagement of the national economy and warning that the country would be unable to meet its economic targets for FY2007/2008.³²⁸ World Bank economist and former Pakistani Finance Minister Shahid Javed Burki is among those who assert that present rates of growth are not sustainable. He also faults Islamabad for maintaining a weak regulatory structure that has not constrained private sector expansion nor regulated emerging monopolies, thus spurring sharp price increases, especially in the telecommunications, real estate, and construction sectors. This, according to him, partly explains why Pakistan's impressive economic growth has brought little benefit to the country's poor.³²⁹

³²⁵ Ali Cheema, "The Political Economy of Crises" (op-ed), Friday Times (Lahore), October 24, 2008.

³²⁶ See <http://siteresources.worldbank.org/SOUTHASIAEXT/Resources/Publications/448813-1188777211460/pakceasummary.pdf>.

³²⁷ See <http://www.adb.org/Documents/Books/ADO/2008/PAK.pdf>.

³²⁸ "Hungry for More Than Change," Los Angeles Times, November 28, 2007; "Pakistan Likely to Miss Most Economic Targets - Minister," Reuters, April 9, 2008.

³²⁹ See http://www.csis.org/media/csis/events/080421_pakistans_econ_swot_burki.pdf.

Trade and Investment

Pakistan's primary exports are cotton, textiles and apparel, rice, and leather products. Although China is the country's leading trade partner (based on more than $5 billion worth of exports to Pakistan in 2007), the United States is by far Pakistan's leading export market, accounting for about one-quarter of the total. During 2007, total U.S. imports from Pakistan were worth just under $3.6 billion (down nearly 3% from 2006). Some 90% of this value came from purchases of textiles and apparel. U.S. exports to Pakistan during 2007 were worth some $2 billion (virtually unchanged from 2006). Civilian aircraft and associated equipment accounted for about one-quarter of this value; raw cotton is another notable U.S. export.³³⁰ Pakistan is the 59th largest export market for U.S. goods.

According to the 2008 National Trade Estimate of the U.S. Trade Representative (USTR), Pakistan has "progressively and substantially reduced tariffs and liberalized its import policies" over the past decade, though a number of trade barriers remain. While estimated trade losses due to copyright piracy in Pakistan were notably lower in 2005, business software and book piracy remains serious concerns.³³¹ Pakistan also has been a world leader in the pirating of music CDs and has appeared on the USTR's "Special 301" Watch List for 18 consecutive years. In 2004, continuing violations caused the USTR to move Pakistan to the Priority Watch List (improved intellectual property rights protection saw it lowered back to the Watch List in 2006, but this status lasted only two years) . From the USTR report:

The government of Pakistan continued to take noticeable steps during 2006 and 2007 to improve copyright enforcement, especially with respect to optical disc piracy. Nevertheless, Pakistan does not provide adequate protection of all intellectual property. Book piracy, weak trademark enforcement, lack of data protection for proprietary pharmaceutical and agricultural chemical test data, and problems with Pakistan's pharmaceutical patent protection remain serious barriers to trade and investment.³³²

In 2007, the USTR again named Pakistan to its Special 301 Watch List, lauding Islamabad for progress on intellectual property rights enforcement, but also expressing ongoing concerns about Pakistan's lack of effective protections in the pharmaceutical sector. In 2008, citing a lack of progress on pharmaceuticals, the USTR put Pakistan back on the Priority Watch List.³³³

According to Pakistan's Ministry of Finance, total foreign direct investment in Pakistan exceeded $6 billion for the year ending June 2008, but many investors remain wary of the country's uncertain political-security circumstances.³³⁴ More than one-third of the foreign investment value comes from U.S.-based investors; much of the remainder originates in Saudi Arabia and other Persian Gulf states. Islamabad is eager to finalize a pending Bilateral Investment Treaty (BIT)

³³⁰ See <http://www.census.gov/foreign-trade/statistics/country/index.html>.

³³¹ The International Intellectual Property Alliance, a coalition of U.S. copyright-based industries, estimated U.S. losses of $156 million due to copyright piracy in Pakistan in 2007 (see <http://www.iipa.com/rbc/2008/2008SPEC301PAKISTAN.pdf>).

³³² See http://www.ustr.gov/assets/Document_Library/Reports_Publications/2008/2008_NTE_Report/asset_upload_file961_14674.pdf.

³³³ See http://www.ustr.gov/assets/Document_Library/Reports_Publications/2008/2008_Special_301_Report/asset_upload_file553_14869.pdf.

³³⁴ "Pakistan Investors Wary of Political Instability," Reuters, August 27, 2007. Pakistan's Finance Ministry reports that foreign investment rates were down by nearly half for the nine-month period ending March 2008.

and reach a Free Trade Agreement with the United States, believing that its vital textile sector will be bolstered by duty-free access to the U.S. market.³³⁵ The establishment of Reconstruction Opportunity Zones that could facilitate development in Pakistan's poor tribal regions, an initiative of President Bush during his March 2006 visit to Pakistan, is under consideration by the 110th Congress (S. 2776 and H.R. 6387).

The Heritage Foundation's 2008 Index of Economic Freedom—which some say may overemphasize the value of absolute growth and downplay broader quality-of-life measurements—again rated Pakistan's economy as being “mostly unfree” and ranked it 93rd out of 157 countries. The index identified restrictive trade policies, a heavy fiscal burden, weak property ownership protections, and limited financial freedoms as issues.³³⁶ Corruption is another serious problem: for 2007, Berlin-based Transparency International placed Pakistan 138th out of 179 countries in its annual ranking of world corruption levels.³³⁷

U.S. Aid and Congressional Action

U.S. Assistance

A total of about $16.5 billion in direct, overt U.S. aid went to Pakistan from 1947 through 2007, including some $4.5 billion for military programs. Since the 2001 renewal of large U.S. assistance packages and reimbursements for militarized counterterrorism efforts, Pakistan by the end of FY2008 had received about $12 billion, the majority of this in the form of coalition support reimbursements, with another $3.1 billion for economic purposes and nearly $2.2 billion for security-related programs (see Table 1). U.S. assistance to Pakistan is meant primarily to maintain that country's ongoing support for U.S.-led counterterrorism efforts. It also seeks to encourage Pakistan's participation in international efforts to prevent the spread of weapons of mass destruction and support in the development of a moderate, democratic, and civilian government which promotes respect for human rights and participation of its citizens in government and society.³³⁸

Consulting fees and administrative overhead can account for anywhere from one-third to more than half of appropriated aid, meaning large sums may never reach the people they are meant to benefit.³³⁹

In June 2003, President Bush hosted President Musharraf at Camp David, Maryland, where he vowed to work with Congress on establishing a five-year, $3 billion aid package for Pakistan. Annual installments of $600 million each, split evenly between military and economic aid, began in FY2005.³⁴⁰ When additional funds for development assistance, law enforcement, and other ³³⁵ According to the U.S. Trade Representative, “a small but significant number of differences have persisted on issues of considerable importance to the United States and [BIT] negotiations are currently suspended” (USTR, 2008 Trade Policy Agenda and 2007 Annual Report, March 2008).

³³⁶ See <http://www.heritage.org/research/features/index/country.cfm?id=Pakistan>.

³³⁷ See <http://www.transparency.org>.

³³⁸ U.S. Department of State FY2008 Congressional Budget Justification for Foreign Operations (Revised), May 2, 2007.

³³⁹ “US Aid ‘Failing to Reach Target,’” BBC News, May 16, 2008.

³⁴⁰ The Foreign Operations FY2005 Appropriations bill (P.L. 108-447) established a new “base program” of $300 (continued...)

programs are included, the estimated non-food aid allocation for FY2008 is $976 million. FY2007 was the first year of the Administration's new plan to devote $750 million in U.S. development aid to Pakistan's tribal areas over a five-year period. The new civilian government seated in Islamabad in early 2008 has urged the United States to further boost its aid as a means of strengthening democracy in Pakistan.³⁴¹

In July 2008, the Enhanced Partnership With Pakistan Act of 2008 (S. 3263) was introduced in the Senate. The act would "affirm and build a sustained, long-term, multifaceted relationship with Pakistan," in part by tripling non-military U.S. assistance to $1.5 billion per year for FY2009-FY2013, and by establishing a sense of Congress that such aid levels should continue through FY2018. It also would condition certain further military assistance and arms transfers to Pakistan on an annual certification by the Secretary of State that the security forces of Pakistan are making "concerted efforts" to prevent Al Qaeda, Taliban, and associated militant groups from operating on Pakistani territory, and that such security forces are "not materially interfering" in Pakistan's political or judicial processes. In introducing the act, the co-sponsoring Chairman and Ranking Member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee expressed a desire to move away from the "transactional" dynamic they believe has characterized U.S.-Pakistan relations and to reverse a pervasive Pakistani sentiment that the United States is not a reliable ally.³⁴²

FATA Development Plan and ROZs

As noted above, Pakistan's tribal areas are remote, isolated, poor, and very traditional in cultural practices. The social and economic privation of the inhabitants is seen to make the region a particularly attractive breeding ground for violent extremists. The U.S.-assisted development initiative for the Federally Administered Tribal Areas, launched in 2003, seeks to improve the quality of education, develop healthcare services, and increase opportunities for economic growth and micro-enterprise specifically in Pakistan's western tribal regions.³⁴³ A senior USAID official estimated that, for FY2001-FY2007, about 6% of U.S. economic aid to Pakistan has been allocated for projects in the FATA.³⁴⁴ The Bush Administration urges Congress to continue funding a proposed five-year, $750 million aid plan for the FATA initiated in FY2007. The plan will support Islamabad's own ten-year, $2 billion Sustainable Development effort there. Skepticism has arisen about the potential for the new policy of significantly boosted funding to be effective. Corruption is endemic in the tribal region and security circumstances are so poor that Western nongovernmental contractors find it extremely difficult to operate there. Moreover, as much as half of the allocated funds likely will be devoted to administrative costs.³⁴⁵ Islamabad is million for military assistance for Pakistan.

(...continued)

³⁴¹ "Premier Says Pakistan Needs More U. S. Aid," Wall Street Journal, May 29, 2008.

³⁴² "Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. and Sen. Richard G. Lugar Hold a News Conference on Pakistan," CQ Transcriptions, July 15, 2008.

³⁴³ See <http://www.usaid.gov/pk/mission/news/fata.htm>.

³⁴⁴ Statement of Acting Deputy USAID Administrator James Kunder before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, December 6, 2007.

³⁴⁵ "Doubts Engulf an American Aid Plan for Pakistan," New York Times, December 25, 2007; "US Aid 'Failing to Reach Target,'" BBC News, May 16, 2008.

insisting that implementation is carried out wholly by Pakistani civil and military authorities and that U.S. aid, while welcomed, must come with no strings attached.³⁴⁶

The related establishment of Reconstruction Opportunity Zones (ROZs) that could facilitate further development in the FATA (and neighboring Afghanistan), an initiative of President Bush during his March 2006 visit to Pakistan, ran into political obstacles in Congress and is yet to be finalized. The ROZ program would provide duty-free access into the U.S. market for certain goods produced in approved areas and potentially create significant employment opportunities. While observers are widely approving of the ROZ plan in principle, many question whether there currently are any products with meaningful export value produced in the FATA. One senior analyst suggests that the need for capital and infrastructural improvements outweighs the need for tariff reductions. A Pakistani commentator has argued that an extremely poor law and order situation in the region will preclude any meaningful investment or industrialization in the foreseeable future.³⁴⁷ In March 2008, more than two years after the initiative was announced, S. 2776, which would provide duty-free treatment for certain goods from designated ROZs in Afghanistan and Pakistan, was introduced in the Senate. A related bill, H.R. 6387, was referred to House subcommittee four months later.

A major July 2008 report from the Council on Foreign Relations presents a cooperative, incentives-based strategy for U.S. engagement in the FATA that would bolster the Pakistani government's capacity while building mutual confidence in the bilateral relationship. The report urges policy makers to weigh the potential gains of unilateral U.S. actions in the FATA—whether military, political, or economic in nature—against the likely costs in the context of fostering mutual trust. It emphasizes that tactical security gains in the region are likely to be ephemeral if not accompanied by rapid political change and economic incentives that comprise what it labels a “generational challenge.”³⁴⁸

Economic Support Funds

The Foreign Assistance Act authorizes the President to furnish assistance to countries and organizations in order to promote economic or political stability. The Economic Support Funds (ESF) requested under this authorization have represented a significant proportion of post-2001 U.S. assistance to Pakistan. Immediately following the September 2001 terrorist attacks on the United States, the 2001 Emergency Supplemental Appropriations Act for Recovery from and Response to Terrorist Attacks on the United States (P.L. 107-38) included appropriation of $600 million in cash transfers for Pakistan under ESF. Congress subsequently authorized Pakistan to use the FY2003 and FY2004 ESF allocations to cancel about $1.5 billion in concessional debt to the U.S. government.

Within the Administration's FY2005-FY2009 assistance plan for Pakistan it was agreed that $200 million of ESF each year (two-thirds of the program total) would be delivered in the form of “budget support”: cash transfers meant to enable the Islamabad government to spend additional resources on education, improving macroeconomic performance, and the quality of and access to ³⁴⁶ “U.S. Aims to Turn Hostile Pakistani Tribes Friendly,” Reuters, January 30, 2008.

³⁴⁷ Statement of Amb. Teresita Schaffer before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, December 6, 2007; Hamid Waleed, “Establishment of Reconstruction Opportunity Zones Almost Impossible” (op-ed), Daily Times (Lahore), January 13, 2007.

³⁴⁸ Daniel Markey, “Securing Pakistan's Tribal Belt,” Council on Foreign Relations Special Report No. 36, July 2008.

healthcare and education. (In the Administration's FY2008 request for foreign operations, Pakistan was to be one of only three countries, along with Jordan and Lebanon, to receive ESF in this form.) These funds were to be used for purposes spelled out in mutually agreed "Shared Objectives" based on goals Pakistan set for itself in its Poverty Reduction Strategy Paper, which is the reference widely used by the donor community. While the State Department and USAID insisted that use of the funds was carefully monitored, criticisms arose that poor oversight and the fungibility of money could allow Pakistan's military-dominated government to use them for purposes other than those intended. In December 2007, the State Department appeared to agree in announcing that budget support for Pakistan will henceforth be "projectized to ensure the money is targeted at the most urgent priorities."³⁴⁹

Coalition Support Funds (CSF)

Congress has appropriated billions of dollars to reimburse Pakistan and other nations for their operational and logistical support of U.S.-led counterterrorism operations. These "coalition support funds" (CSF) account for the bulk of U.S. financial transfers to Pakistan since 2001. As of November 2008, more than $9 billion had been appropriated or authorized for FY2002-FY2008 Pentagon spending for CSF for "key cooperating nations." Pentagon documents show that disbursements to Islamabad—at some $6.7 billion or an average of $79 million per month—account for roughly four-fifths of these funds. The amount is equal to about one-quarter of Pakistan's total military expenditures. According to Secretary of Defense Gates, CSF payments have been used to support approximately 90 Pakistani army operations and help to keep some 100,000 Pakistani troops in the field in northwest Pakistan by paying for food, clothing, and housing. They also compensate Islamabad for ongoing coalition usage of Pakistani airfields and seaports.³⁵⁰

Concerns have grown in Congress and among independent analysts that standard accounting procedures were not employed in overseeing these large disbursements from the U.S. Treasury. The State Department claims that Pakistan's requests for CSF reimbursements are carefully vetted by several executive branch agencies, must be approved by the Secretary of Defense, and ultimately can be withheld through specific congressional action. However, a large proportion of CSF funds may have been lost to waste and mismanagement, given a dearth of adequate controls and oversight. Senior Pentagon officials reportedly have taken steps to overhaul the process through which reimbursements and other military aid is provided to Pakistan, perhaps including linking payments to specific objectives.³⁵¹ The National Defense Authorization Act for FY2008 (P.L. 110-181) for the first time required the Secretary of Defense to submit to Congress itemized descriptions of coalition support reimbursements to Pakistan.

The Government Accountability Office (GAO) was tasked to address oversight of coalition support funds that go to Pakistan. A report issued in June 2008 found that, until about one year before, only a small fraction of Pakistani requests were disallowed or deferred. In March 2007, the value of rejected requests spiked considerably, although it still represented one-quarter or less of the total. The apparent increased scrutiny corresponds with the arrival in Islamabad of a new ³⁴⁹ See <http://www.state.gov/p/sca/rls/rm/2007/96566.htm>.

³⁵⁰ Statement before the Senate Armed Services Committee, February 6, 2008.

³⁵¹ See <http://www.state.gov/p/sca/rls/rm/2007/96566.htm>; "U.S. Payments to Pakistan Face New Scrutiny," Washington Post, February 21, 2008; "Pakistani Military 'Misspent Up to 70% of American Aid,'" Guardian (London), February 28, 2008; "Democrats Question $6 Billion in Pakistan Aid," Associated Press, May 6, 2008.

U.S. Defense Representative, an army major general who reportedly has played a greater role in the oversight process. GAO concluded that increased oversight and accountability was needed over Pakistan's reimbursement claims for coalition support funds.³⁵² In August 2008, the leader of Pakistan's ruling party, now-President Asif Zardari claimed, without providing evidence, that as president Pervez Musharraf had been passing only a fraction of the funds over to the Pakistani military, leaving some $700 million of reimbursements per year "missing."³⁵³

Possible Adjustments to U.S. Assistance Programs

Critics contend that many of the stated institutional and development goals of U.S. assistance to Pakistan remain largely unmet in part due to a perceived U.S. over-reliance on security-related aid. One major study found that only about one-tenth of U.S. aid was being directed toward development, governance, and humanitarian programs.³⁵⁴ For numerous Pakistan-watchers, a policy of "enhanced cooperation and structured inducements" is viewed as likely to be more effective than a policy based on pressure and threats.³⁵⁵ Many argue that it could be useful to target U.S. assistance programs in such a way that they more effectively and more directly benefit the country's citizens. Some analysts call for improving America's image in Pakistan by making U.S. aid more visible to ordinary Pakistanis.³⁵⁶ A costly downside of the perceived focus on security-related aid is that it can empower illiberal forces in Pakistan, namely, the country's military and intelligence agencies, which are seen to have stunted the growth and development of democratic institutions and the rule of law.

One idea commonly floated by analysts is the "conditioning" of aid to Pakistan, perhaps through the creation of "benchmarks." For example, in 2003, a task force of senior American South Asia watchers issued a report on U.S. policy in the region that included a recommendation that the extent of U.S. support for Islamabad should be linked to that government's own performance in making Pakistan a more "modern, progressive, and democratic state." Specifically, the task force urged directing two-thirds of U.S. aid to economic programs and one-third to security assistance, and conditioning increases in aid amounts to progress in Pakistan's reform agenda.³⁵⁷ Some commentators emphasize that, to be truly effective, conditionality should be applied by many donor countries rather than just the United States and should be directed toward the Pakistani leadership—especially the military—to the exclusion of the general public.³⁵⁸ In the wake of political crises and deteriorating security circumstances in Pakistan in 2007, some senior ³⁵² See <http://www.gao.gov/new.items/d08806.pdf>. See also "Pentagon Puts Brakes on Funds to Pakistan," Los Angeles Times, May 7, 2008.

³⁵³ Quoted in "Where's the Money?," Sunday Times (London), August 10, 2008.

³⁵⁴ Craig Cohen, "A Perilous Course: U.S. Strategy and Assistance to Pakistan," Center for Strategic and International Studies, August 2007.

³⁵⁵ See, for example, Daniel Markey, "Securing Pakistan's Tribal Belt," Council on Foreign Relations Special Report No. 36, July 2008.

³⁵⁶ See, for example, Lisa Curtis, "Denying Terrorists Safe Haven in Pakistan," Heritage Foundation Backgrounder No. 1981, October 26, 2006.

³⁵⁷ "New Priorities in South Asia: U.S. Policy Toward India, Pakistan, and Afghanistan," Chairmen's Report of an Independent Task Force Cosponsored by the Council on Foreign Relations and the Asia Society, October 2003.

³⁵⁸ See, for example, Frederic Grare, "Rethinking Western Strategies Toward Pakistan," Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, 2007.

Members of Congress were more vocal in calling for conditions on further U.S. assistance in lieu of improvements in these areas.³⁵⁹

Many analysts, however, including those making policy for the Bush Administration, contend that conditioning U.S. aid to Pakistan has a past record of failure and likely would be counterproductive by reinforcing Pakistani perceptions of the United States as a fickle and unreliable partner. From this perspective, putting additional pressure on an already weak Islamabad government might lead to significant political instability in Pakistan.³⁶⁰ One senior Washington-based analyst who advocates against placing conditions on U.S. aid to Pakistan instead offers an admittedly modest and “not entirely satisfying” approach that would modify current U.S. policy through more forceful private admonitions to Islamabad to better focus its own counterterrorism efforts while also targeting Taliban leadership, increased provision of U.S. counterinsurgency technologies and training to Pakistani security forces, and the establishment of benchmarks for continued provision of coalition support funding.³⁶¹ Private admonitions are considered by some analysts to be meaningless in the absence of public consequences, however.

For Pakistanis themselves, aid conditionality in U.S. congressional legislation can raise unpleasant memories of 1985’s Pressler Amendment, which led to a near-total aid cutoff in 1990. Islamabad’s sensitivities are thus acute: in 2007, the Pakistan Foreign Ministry said aid conditions legislated in the Implementing the 9/11 Commission Recommendations Act of 2007 (P.L. 110-53) “cast a shadow” on existing U.S.-Pakistan cooperation and create linkages that “did not serve the interest of bilateral cooperation in the past and can prove to be detrimental in the future.”³⁶² Calls for further conditionality from some in Congress led Islamabad to again warn that such moves could harm the bilateral relationship and do damage to U.S. interests. Nevertheless, the State Department reported being “comfortable” with congressional conditions and “confident” that required reports could be issued.³⁶³

Analysts have also issued criticisms of the programming of aid to Pakistan within the security-related portions. Foremost among these are assertions that the Pakistani military maintains an institutional focus on conventional war-fighting capabilities oriented toward India and that it has used U.S. security assistance to bolster these capabilities while paying insufficient attention to the kinds of counterinsurgency capacity that U.S. policy makers might prefer to see strengthened. For example, of the nearly $1.6 billion in Foreign Military Financing provided to Pakistan from FY2002-FY2008, more than half has been used by Islamabad to purchase weapons of limited use in the context of counterterrorism. These include maritime patrol aircraft, anti-armor missiles, surveillance radars, upgrade kits for F-16 combat aircraft, and self-propelled howitzers. Counterarguments contend that such purchases facilitate regional stability and allow Pakistan to feel more secure vis-à-vis India, its more powerful neighbor.

³⁵⁹ See, for example, “Senate Leader Wants Bush to Pressure Pakistan,” Reuters, January 10, 2008; “Democrat Questions US Aid to Pakistan,” Associated Press, May 27, 2008.

³⁶⁰ See, for example, Daniel Markey, “A False Choice in Pakistan,” Foreign Affairs, July 2007.

³⁶¹ Ashley Tellis, “Pakistan: Conflicted Ally in the War on Terror,” Carnegie Endowment Policy Brief 56, December 2007.

³⁶² See http://www.mofa.gov.pk/Press_Releases/2007/july/PR_199_07.htm.

³⁶³ “Pakistan Rejects Call for Conditions on U.S. Aid,” Reuters, January 11, 2008; State Department claim at <http://www.state.gov/p/sca/rls/rm/2007/97946.htm>.

Pervasive anti-American sentiment in Pakistan has led the U.S. government to minimize its “footprint” when providing aid in certain regions, especially the FATA region bordering Afghanistan. This has meant that some projects are conducted in ways similar to covert operations under the cover of Pakistani government agencies. Although such an approach facilitates delivery of aid, public diplomacy gains can be sacrificed when aid beneficiaries are unaware of the origin of the assistance they are receiving. Because development of Pakistan’s tribal areas is identified as a key U.S. national security goal in and of itself, such costs may be considered acceptable. Instability in Pakistan has led to increased calls for more and better-spent U.S. assistance there. While support for the “Biden-Lugar” plan (S. 3263) is widespread among analysts, some warn that Pakistan’s crises are so urgent that the country requires large infusions of aid in the nearer-term.³⁶⁴

Coup-Related Legislation

Pakistan’s 1999 military coup triggered U.S. aid restrictions under Section 508 of the annual foreign assistance appropriations act. Post-September 2001 circumstances saw Congress take action on such restrictions. P.L. 107-57 waived coup-related sanctions on Pakistan through FY2002 and granted presidential authority to waive them through FY2003. In issuing the waiver, the President was required to certify that doing so “would facilitate the transition to democratic rule in Pakistan” and “is important to United States efforts to respond to, deter, or prevent acts of international terrorism.” President Bush exercised this waiver authority six times. Pakistan’s relatively credible 2008 polls spurred the Bush Administration to issue an April 2008 determination that a democratically elected government had been restored in Islamabad after a 101-month hiatus. This determination permanently removed coup-related aid sanctions.³⁶⁵

Proliferation-Related Legislation

Through a series of legislative measures, Congress incrementally lifted sanctions on Pakistan resulting from its nuclear weapons proliferation activities.³⁶⁶ After the September 2001 terrorist attacks on the United States, policymakers searched for new means of providing assistance to Pakistan. President Bush’s issuance of a final determination that month removed remaining sanctions on Pakistan (and India) resulting from the 1998 nuclear tests, finding that restrictions were not in U.S. national security interests. Some Members of the 108th Congress urged reinstatement of proliferation-related sanctions in response to evidence of Pakistani assistance to third-party nuclear weapons programs. However, the Nuclear Black-Market Elimination Act (H.R. 4965) died in committee. Legislation in the 109th Congress included the Pakistan Proliferation Accountability Act of 2005 (H.R. 1553), which sought to prohibit the provision of military equipment to Pakistan unless the President could certify that Pakistan has verifiably halted all proliferation activities and is fully sharing with the United States all information relevant to the A.Q. Khan proliferation network. This bill also did not emerge from committee.

³⁶⁴ “Pakistan Unrest Raises Fresh Calls for U.S. Aid,” Reuters, September 23, 2008; Anatol Lieven, “Urgent Aid for Pakistan” (op-ed), International Herald Tribune, September 7, 2008.

³⁶⁵ See <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2008/03/20080325-2.html>; Federal Register 73, 69, p. 19276-19277, April 9, 2008.

³⁶⁶ The Agricultural Export Relief Act of 1998 (P.L. 105-194) allowed U.S. wheat sales to Pakistan after July 1998. The India-Pakistan Relief Act of 1998 (in P.L. 105-277) authorized a one-year sanctions waiver exercised by President Clinton in November 1998. The Department of Defense Appropriations Act, 2000 (P.L. 106-79) gave the President permanent authority to waive nuclear-test-related sanctions applied against Pakistan and India after October 1999, when President Clinton waived economic sanctions on India (Pakistan remained under sanctions as a result of the October 1999 coup). (See CRS Report RS20995, India and Pakistan: U.S. Economic Sanctions, by Dianne E. Rennack.)

In the 110th Congress, the House-passed version of the Implementing the 9/11 Commission Recommendations Act of 2007 (H.R. 1) included provisions to suspend all arms sales licenses and deliveries to any “nuclear proliferation host country” unless the President certifies that such a country is, inter alia, fully investigating and taking actions to permanently halt illicit nuclear proliferation activities. Related Senate-passed legislation (S. 4) contained no such language and the provisions did not appear in the subsequent law (P.L. 110-53).

9/11 Commission Recommendations

The 9/11 Commission Report, released in 2004, identified the government of President Musharraf as the best hope for stability in Pakistan and Afghanistan, and it recommended that the United States make a long-term commitment to provide comprehensive support for Islamabad so long as Pakistan itself is committed to combating extremism and to a policy of “enlightened moderation.” In the Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act of 2004 (P.L. 108-458), Congress broadly endorsed this recommendation by calling for U.S. aid to Pakistan to be sustained at a minimum of FY2005 levels and requiring the President to report to Congress a description of long-term U.S. strategy to engage with and support Pakistan. A 2005 follow-on report by Commissioners gave a “C” grade to U.S. efforts to support Pakistan’s anti-extremism policies and warned that the country “remains a sanctuary and training ground for terrorists.” In the 109th Congress, H.R. 5017 and S. 3456 sought to insure implementation of the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission. The bills contained Pakistan-specific language, but neither emerged from committee.

A new Democratic majority took up the issue again in 2007. The premiere House resolution of the 110th Congress, the Implementing the 9/11 Commission Recommendations Act of 2007 (H.R. 1), was passed in January containing discussion of U.S. policy toward Pakistan. The resultant law (P.L. 110-53) included conditions on U.S. aid to Pakistan for the first time in the post-9/11 era. The Bush Administration opposed the language, arguing that “conditionality” would be counterproductive to the goal of closer U.S.-Pakistan relations.

Selected Pakistan-Related Legislation in the 110th Congress

P.L. 110-53: The Implementing the 9/11 Commission Recommendations Act of 2007 (became Public Law on August 3, 2007):

- Would have ended U.S. military assistance and arms sales licensing to Pakistan in FY2008 unless the President reported to Congress that Islamabad was “undertaking a comprehensive military, legal, economic, and political campaign” to “eliminating from Pakistani territory any organization such as the Taliban, al Qaeda, or any successor, engaged in military, insurgent, or terrorist activities in Afghanistan,” and was making progress toward eliminating support or safe haven for terrorists.”
- Required the President report to Congress a long-term U.S. strategy for engaging Pakistan.

- Provided an extension of the President’s authority to waive coup-related sanctions through FY2008.

P.L. 110-161: The Consolidated Appropriations Act, 2008 (became Public Law on December 26, 2007):

- Provided $250 million in FY2008 Foreign Military Financing for Pakistani counterterrorism activities. Another $50 million would be provided for such purposes after the Secretary of State reported to Congress that Pakistan is “making concerted efforts” to combat both Al Qaeda and Taliban forces on Pakistani territory and is “implementing democratic reforms.”
- Appropriated $300 million for FY2008 coalition support reimbursements to Pakistan and other key cooperating nations.

P.L. 110-181: The National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) for FY2008 (became Public Law on January 28, 2008):

- Authorized up to $75 million in FY2008 Section 1206 funding to enhance the counterterrorism capabilities of Pakistan’s paramilitary Frontier Corp. Such assistance is to be provided in a manner that “promotes respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms and respect for legitimate civilian authority within Pakistan.”
- Authorized up to $1.2 billion in FY2008 Pentagon coalition support reimbursements to “any key cooperating nation” in connection with U.S. military operations in Iraq or Afghanistan.
- Would have withheld coalition support reimbursements to Pakistan unless the Secretary of Defense submitted to Congress a report on enhancing security and stability along the Afghanistan-Pakistan border. The report required a “detailed description” of Pakistan’s efforts to “eliminate safe havens for the Taliban, Al Qaeda and other violent extremists on the national territory of Pakistan” and to “prevent the movement of such forces across the border of Pakistan into Afghanistan.... ”
- Required the Secretary of Defense to submit to Congress itemized descriptions of coalition support reimbursements to Pakistan for the period February 2008-September 2009.

P.L. 110-417: The National Defense Authorization Act for FY2009 (became Public Law on October 14, 2008):

- Extended Section 1206 authority to build the capacity of Pakistan’s Frontier Corps through FY2009 and limits the authorized funding for such assistance to $25 million.
- Amended the NDAA for FY2008 (P.L. 110-181) by requiring additional Administration reporting on efforts to enhance security and stability along the Pakistan-Afghanistan border.

P.L. 110-429: The Naval Vessel Transfer Act of 2008 (became Public Law on October 15, 2008):

- Authorized the President to transfer to Pakistan the guided missile frigate USS McInerney as an excess defense article as per H.R. 5916.

S. 2776: The Afghanistan and Pakistan Reconstruction Opportunity Zones Act of 2008 (referred to Senate committee on March 13, 2008; a related bill, H.R. 6387, was referred to House subcommittee on July 9, 2008):

- Would provide duty-free treatment for certain goods from designated Reconstruction Opportunity Zones in Afghanistan and Pakistan.

S. 3263: The Enhanced Partnership With Pakistan Act of 2008 (reported out Senate committee on September 26, 2008, and placed on the Senate calendar):

- Would make it the policy of the United States to “affirm and build a sustained, long-term, multifaceted relationship with Pakistan.”
- Would triple non-military U.S. assistance to Pakistan to $1.5 billion per year for FY2009-FY2013, and establish a sense of Congress that such aid levels should continue through FY2018.
- Would condition further military assistance and arms transfers to Pakistan on an annual certification by the Secretary of State that the security forces of Pakistan are making “concerted efforts” to prevent Al Qaeda, Taliban, and associated militant groups from operating on Pakistani territory, and that such security forces are “not materially interfering” in Pakistan’s political or judicial processes.
- Would express the sense of Congress that coalition support payments to Pakistan are a “critical component” of the global counterterrorism effort and that increased oversight and accountability is needed over Pakistan’s reimbursement claims for such funds.
- Would require the Secretary of State to develop a “comprehensive, cross-border strategy” for Afghanistan and Pakistan and report to Congress a detailed description of such a strategy.

Table I. Overt U.S. Aid and Military Reimbursements to Pakistan, FY2002-FY2009

(rounded to the nearest millions of dollars)

Program or Account	FY2002	FY2003	FY2004	FY2005	FY2006	FY2007	FY2008 (est.)	FY2002- FY2008 Total	FY2009 (req.)
I206	—	—	—	—	23	14	57	94	^a
CN	—	—	—	8	29	39	55	131	^a
CSF ^b	1,169 ^c	1,247	705	964	862	731	993 ^d	6,672	200 ^e
FC	—	—	—	—	—	—	75	75	25 ^a
FMF	75	225	75	299	297	297	298	1,566	300
IMET	1	1	1	2	2	2	2	11	2
INCLE	91	31	32	32	38	21	22	267	32
NADR ^f	10	1	5	8	9	10	10	53	11
Total Security-Related	1,346	1,505	818	1,313	1,260	1,115	1,512	8,869	570
CSH	14	16	26	21	28	22	30	157	28
DA	10	35	49	29	38	95	30	286	—
ESF ^g	615	188	200	298	337	389	347	2,374	603 ^h
Food Aid ⁱ	5	28	13	32	55	—	42	175	37
HRDF	1	—	2	2	1	11	—	17	—
MRA	9	7	6	6	10	4	—	42	—
Total Economic-Related	654	274	296	388	539^j	521	449	3,121ⁱ	668
Grand Total	2,000	1,779	1,114	1,701	1,799	1,636	1,961	11,990	1,238

Sources: U.S. Departments of State, Defense, and Agriculture; U.S. Agency for International Development.

Abbreviations:

I206: Section 1206 of the National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) for FY2006 (P.L. 109-163, global train and equip; Pentagon budget)

CN: Counternarcotics Funds (Pentagon budget)

CSF: Coalition Support Funds (Pentagon budget)

CSH: Child Survival and Health

DA: Development Assistance

ESF: Economic Support Fund

FC: Section 1206 of the NDAA for FY2008 (P.L. 110-181, Pakistan Frontier Corp train and equip; Pentagon budget)

FMF: Foreign Military Financing

HRDF: Human Rights and Democracy funding

IMET: International Military Education and Training

INCLE: International Narcotics Control and Law Enforcement (includes border security)

MRA: Migration and Refugee Assistance

NADR: Nonproliferation, Anti-Terrorism, Demining, and Related^f

Notes:

- a. This funding is “requirements-based for “urgent and emergent threats and opportunities.” Thus, there are no pre-allocation data. The NDAA for FY2009 (P.L. 110-417) limits FY2009 FC funding to $25 million.
- b. CSF is Pentagon Funding to reimburse Pakistan for its support of U.S. military operations. It is not officially designated as foreign assistance, but is counted as such by many analysts.
- c. Includes $220 million for Peacekeeping Operations reported by the State Department.
- d. Includes CSF payments for support provided through March 2008. The Consolidated Appropriations Act, 2008 (P.L. 110-161), and the Supplemental Appropriations Act, 2008 (P.L. 110-252), appropriated a total of $1.1 billion for FY2008 CST payments to key cooperating nations, including Pakistan, which historically has received about 80% of such funds.
- e. The Administration has requested $900 million for continuing CSF payments in FY2009. To date, Congress has appropriated $200 million for such purposes P.L. 110-252.
- f. The great majority of NADR funds allocated for Pakistan are for anti-terrorism assistance.
- g. Congress authorized Pakistan to use the FY2003 and FY2004 ESF allocations to cancel a total of about $1.5 billion in concessional debt to the U.S. government. From FY2005-FY2007, $200 million per year in ESF was delivered in the form of “budget support”—cash transfers to Pakistan. Such funds will be “projectized” from FY2008 on.
- h. Includes a “bridge” supplemental ESF appropriation of $150 million (P.L. 110-252).
- i. P.L.480 Title I (loans), P.L.480 Title II (grants), and Section 416(b) of the Agricultural Act of 1949, as amended (surplus agricultural commodity donations). Food aid totals do not include freight cost.
- j. Includes $70 million in FY2006 International Disaster and Famine Assistance funds for Pakistani earthquake relief.

Figure 1. Map of Pakistan

Source: Map Resources. Adapted by CRS.

Figure 2. District Map of Pakistan’s North West Frontier Province and Federally Administered Tribal Areas

Author Contact Information

K. Alan Kronstadt
 Specialist in South Asian Affairs
 kkronstadt@crs.loc.gov, 7-5415