

Congressional Research Service

Informing the legislative debate since 1914

Terrorism in Southeast Asia

name redacted

Specialist in Asian Affairs

name redacted

Specialist in Asian Affairs

name redacted

Specialist in Asian Affairs

name redacted

Specialist in Asian Affairs

name redacted

Analyst in Asian Affairs

name redacted

Specialist in Terrorism and National Security

May 12, 2016

Congressional Research Service

7-....

www.crs.gov

R44501

Summary

Southeast Asia is home to more than 620 million people and around 15% of the world's Muslim population. The region has faced the threat of terrorism for decades, but threats in Southeast Asia have never been considered as great as threats in some other regions. The rise of the Islamic State, however, poses new, heightened challenges for Southeast Asian governments, and for U.S. policy towards the vibrant and strategically important region.

Southeast Asia has numerous dynamic economies and three Muslim-majority states, including the world's largest Muslim-majority nation, Indonesia, which also is the world's third largest democracy (by population) after India and the United States, respectively. Although the mainstream of Islamic practice across the region is comparatively tolerant of other religions, Southeast Asia is also home to several longstanding and sometimes violent separatist movements, as well as pockets of Islamist radicalism, which have led to instances of violence over the past 30 years. These were particularly acute during the 2000s, when several attacks in Indonesia killed hundreds of Indonesians and dozens of Westerners. The threat seemingly eased in the late 2000s-early 2010s, with the success of some Southeast Asian governments' efforts to combat violent militancy and degrade some of the region's foremost terrorist groups. The Islamic State's rise, however, raises new challenges for Southeast Asia. Several Southeast Asian governments, including Indonesia, Malaysia, and Singapore, have intensified counterterror efforts since 2014, outlawing calls for support of the Islamic State and strengthening policing and border-control efforts. Nevertheless, the challenges that governments in the region face were exemplified in January 2016 by a violent attack in Jakarta, Indonesia, that killed eight people, including four civilians.

There are several factors that characterize the terrorism threat in Southeast Asia. The region's largest Muslim-majority nations, Indonesia and Malaysia, have long been known for moderate forms of Islam and the protection of religious diversity—policies that have widespread popular support but which raise resentments among small numbers of conservative actors. In other Southeast Asian countries with substantial Muslim populations, such as the Philippines and Thailand, simmering resentments in Muslim-majority regions have been fed by perceived cultural and economic repression, leading to separatist movements that have posed threats to domestic groups—and in the case of the Philippines, to Western targets.

Threats are evolving with the rise of the Islamic State, which has conducted extensive recruitment in Indonesia's national language (called "Bahasa Indonesia") and in the Malay language widely spoken in the region. Though the number of Southeast Asians who have traveled to the Middle East to fight with the Islamic State is considerably lower than numbers from other regions, such as Europe, North Africa, and South Asia, observers estimate that hundreds of Southeast Asians have joined the fight, raising concerns that battle-trained individuals may return to the region and conduct attacks. It is difficult to estimate the number of fighters with precision. Southeast Asia's borders are comparatively porous, raising concerns about trans-border threats that may lead to attacks in third-party states, such as Singapore. This raises the issue of border controls, an important factor for addressing terrorism. Governments in the region have sought better coordination and intelligence sharing—efforts that have been supported by the United States.

The threat of terrorism in Southeast Asia has implications for numerous U.S. interests, as the region has had growing prominence in U.S. foreign-policy initiatives under the Obama Administration's "strategic rebalance" to the Asia-Pacific region. U.S. security relations with several Southeast Asian countries have deepened against the backdrop of rising strategic competition with China. This report focuses on Indonesia, the Philippines, Malaysia, Thailand, Australia, and Singapore.

The United States has offered counterterrorism assistance to several Southeast Asian nations. These include helping Indonesia create a centralized antiterrorism unit and providing U.S. troops on the Southern Philippine island of Basilan to help the Armed Forces of the Philippines combat violent groups in the country's deep South. Congress may wish to evaluate the effectiveness of such assistance, and examine funding levels for counterterrorism assistance. Congress may also wish to consider the relationship between counterterrorism assistance and other U.S. goals in the region, including the development of human rights and civil society in Southeast Asia.

This report will be updated periodically.

Contents

Overview	1
Historical Context and the Rise of the Islamic State	2
U.S. Interests and Policy Responses	4
Country-Level Issues.....	7
Indonesia	8
Primary Groups.....	9
State Responses.....	10
Counterterrorism Cooperation with the United States and the Region	11
Philippines.....	11
Primary Groups.....	12
State Responses.....	14
Counterterrorism Cooperation with the United States and the Region	15
Malaysia	16
Primary Groups.....	16
State Responses.....	18
Counterterrorism Cooperation with the United States and the Region	19
Thailand	20
Primary Groups.....	20
State Responses.....	21
Counterterrorism Cooperation with the United States and the Region	21
Australia	22
Primary Groups.....	22
State Responses.....	23
Counterterrorism Cooperation with the United States and the Region	24
Singapore	25
Primary Groups.....	25
State Responses.....	25
Counterterrorism Cooperation with the United States and the Region	26
Outlook.....	26

Figures

Figure 1. Muslim Population Percent of Total Population	3
Figure 2. Indonesia	8
Figure 3. Philippines.....	13
Figure 4. Malaysia.....	17

Tables

Table 1. NADR and NADR Anti-Terrorism Assistance (NADR-ATA)	7
---	---

Contacts

Author Contact Information 27

Overview

Militant Islamist groups have operated in Southeast Asia for decades. The region, home to more than 620 million people, has numerous countries with large Muslim populations, including Indonesia, the world's most populous Muslim-majority nation and the world's third most populous democracy (after India and the United States). The region is home to several longstanding and sometimes violent separatist movements, as well as pockets of Islamist radicalism, which have led to instances of violence over the past 30 years, particularly during the 2000s.

Many observers have noted the success of some Southeast Asian governments' efforts combatting violent militancy and degrading some of the region's foremost terrorist groups, including the pan-regional, but largely Indonesian based, Jemaah Islamiyah and the Philippines' Abu Sayyaf. The United States has offered considerable counterterrorism assistance to Southeast Asian governments, particularly since the September 11, 2001, attacks. These include helping Indonesia create a centralized antiterrorism unit and providing U.S. advisory troops on the Southern Philippine island of Basilan to help the Armed Forces of the Philippines combat violent groups in the country's deep South.

The rise of the Islamic State (IS) in Iraq and Syria¹ since 2014, however, has raised the possibility of new and heightened terrorism risks in Southeast Asia. A January 2016 terrorist attack in Jakarta, Indonesia, that killed eight individuals, four of them civilians, demonstrated that militants in the region are seeking support or inspiration from the Islamic State, increasing the risks of terrorism in Southeast Asia—risks that could harm United States citizens or adversely affect U.S. security interests in the region.²

Despite perceptions among analysts that such risks are rising, Southeast Asian nations generally have not been seen as a front-line threats on par with some other parts of the world. As Congress considers U.S. policy towards Southeast Asia, it may wish to consider several questions:

- What is the nature and extent of radicalization in Southeast Asia, and does it constitute a threat to U.S. interests in the region? If so, how, and to what extent?
- What is the nature of threats to U.S. security interests that radicalism poses in Southeast Asia, and how acute are they?
- Are these threats increasing in significance? Are threat levels affected by the rise of the Islamic State? If so, in what ways?
- How effective are Southeast Asian governments' capabilities to monitor and combat the threat of terrorism in their homelands, and to coordinate efforts when those threats spread across borders? Where these capabilities are insufficient, could U.S. assistance help address capability gaps?
- What priority should policymakers place on supporting counterterrorism efforts in Southeast Asia, compared with other U.S. security, diplomatic and economic goals? What are the most effective legislative and oversight tools that Congress has at its disposal to help shape the development and ordering of those priorities?

¹ The Islamic State (IS), Islamic State in Iraq and the Levant (ISIL), the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria (ISIS), and the Arabic acronym Da'esh all refer to the same organization. For more on the Islamic State, see CRS Report R43612, The Islamic State and U.S. Policy, by (name redacted) and (name redacted).

² Zachary Abuza, "Beyond Bombings: The Islamic State in Southeast Asia," The Diplomat, January 15, 2016.

- What tools does Congress have at its disposal to ensure that U.S. support for Southeast Asian counterterrorism efforts does not encourage and enable countries to unduly curtail human rights and the rule of law?
- What lessons might be drawn from Southeast Asian efforts to degrade terrorist groups and de-radicalize individuals harboring militant views, and is the Administration effectively evaluating such lessons? Are these lessons applicable in other parts of the world as well?

Historical Context and the Rise of the Islamic State

Southeast Asia is home to large Sunni Muslim populations—around 240 million people region-wide, or 40% of Southeast Asia’s overall population and over 15% of the world’s estimated Muslim population – making it one of the primary demographic centers of the Islamic world.³ The vast majority of Southeast Asian Muslims have traditionally subscribed to moderate, syncretic forms of the religion. More conservative Sunni communities, however, have grown with support from donors in the Arab Gulf states since the late 20th century and small pockets of radicalism have been active for decades.

Militant Islamist groups in Southeast Asia have widely different origins. Longstanding separatist movements in parts of the Indonesian archipelago, particularly in Aceh, have also created safe havens for violent groups. The Philippines and Thailand—dominated, respectively, by Catholic and Buddhist majorities—have fought separatist movements in their Muslim-majority southern regions for decades, and grievances in those regions have led to extremism and violence. Islam played a role in anti-U.S. insurgency in the Philippines from the earliest stages of U.S. colonial involvement in the Philippines in the late 19th century.⁴ Malaysia, another Muslim-majority nation, has not had a strong indigenous terrorist movement, but like the other nations in the region, its porous borders have allowed terrorists to operate from its shores. Some observers also believe Malaysia has been an active source and transit point for terrorist financing.

With the notable exception of the Jemaah Islamiyah network in the early 2000s, the linkages among violent Southeast Asian groups, and links between them and groups centered in the Middle East, traditionally have been weak. Most Southeast Asian militant groups have operated only in their own country or islands, and focused on domestic issues such as promoting the adoption of Islamic law (sharia) and seeking independence from central government control.

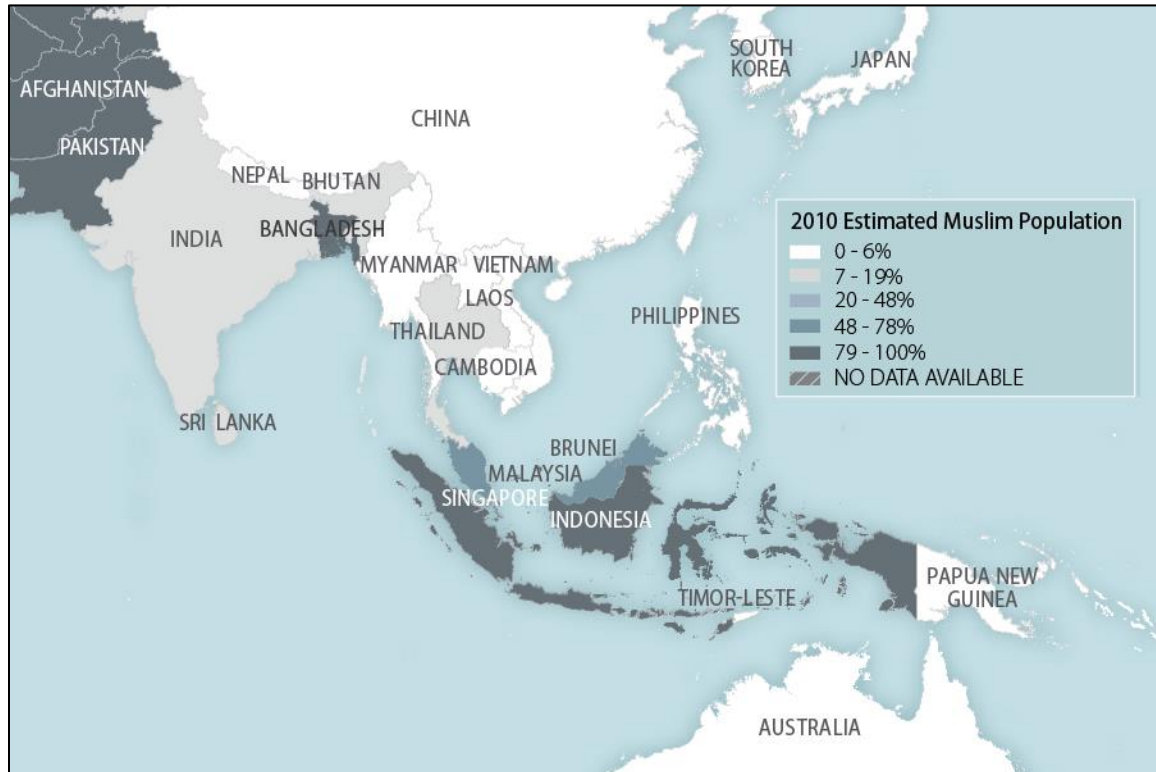

However, the war in Afghanistan and the rise of globalized social media contributed to the radicalization of Islam in Southeast Asia, and Jemaah Islamiyah was widely linked to Al Qaeda, and to the Abu Sayyaf Group in the Philippines. Likewise, over the past two years, the rise of the Islamic State has led to a new phase of Islamist militancy in Southeast Asia, as in the Middle East and across the Muslim world. Terrorism experts say IS offers inspiration, and the potential for training and material support, for militants in Southeast Asia. IS has conducted online recruitment efforts in Indonesia’s national language (called “Bahasa Indonesia”) and in the Malay language. Analysts estimate that hundreds of Southeast Asians have travelled to the Middle East to fight with IS—just as some did in the late 1990s in Afghanistan with Al Qaeda. Terrorism experts

³ A Pew Research Center study estimated the world total Muslim population in 2010 at approximately 1.6 billion, with over 60% in South and Southeast Asia.

⁴ Graham Turbiville, “Bearers of the Sword of Radical Islam, Philippines Insurgency, and Regional Stability,” <http://fmso.leavenworth.army.mil/documents/sword.htm>.

describe a Southeast Asian “military arm” of the Islamic State known as Katibah Nusantara, made up of Indonesians, Malaysians and others, operating in Syria.⁵

Figure 1. Muslim Population Percent of Total Population

Source: Pew Research, “Interactive Data Table: World Muslim Population by Region,” <http://www.pewforum.org>.

Several Southeast Asian governments, including Indonesia, Malaysia, and Singapore, have intensified counterterror efforts since 2014, outlawing calls for support of IS and strengthening policing and border-control efforts.⁶ It is difficult to estimate with precision how many individuals from the region have traveled to the Middle East to join the Islamic State fight, or how much financial support the group has derived from Southeast Asia. Authorities in Indonesia, Malaysia, the Philippines, and Singapore, however, have all expressed concerns that the return of battle-trained militants from the Middle East who could conduct attacks in-country or train others to do so poses a threat.⁷

Some analysts have noted that Southeast Asian counterterrorism efforts in the 2000s and early 2010s largely broke up or weakened large terrorist groups in the region such as JI and Abu Sayyaf. However, many observers argue that this has led to a dangerous situation in which small, splinter groups that have survived may now have incentives to use violence to demonstrate their effectiveness and bolster their legitimacy. In so doing, they have sought to attract material support from IS (or other outside groups such as Al Qaeda), and to recruit new members. One other potential concern is that terrorist activity may increase as competition grows between the Islamic State and Al Qaeda over the leadership, definition, and goals of the global community of jihadist-Salafist Sunni Muslims. Some argue this rivalry has created “a rift within the region’s Islamist fraternity by dividing them into Al-Qaeda loyalists and Islamic State followers.”⁸

⁵ Joe Cochrane, “More on Katibah Nusantara: Military Unit Under ISIS Linked to Jakarta Attack,” New York Times, January 12, 2016.

⁶ “Southeast Asia Increasingly Worried with Islamic State’s Alluring Appeal,” Agence France Presse, September 30, 2014.

⁷ “Returning ISIS Fighters ‘Pose Threat to Region,’” Straits Times, October 30, 2014.

Some regional officials are concerned that in this new phase, militants may shift strategy and tactics. New attacks may seek to emulate the November 2015 Paris attacks to attack soft targets. There is a potentially larger pool of battle-hardened fighters that could return home from Syria or Iraq to carry out such attacks or to spread radicalism to others. There appears to be increasing use of social media as a recruitment tool that can inspire lone-wolf attacks and draw converts to the IS cause. While it is too early to draw conclusions, the January 2016 Jakarta attacks, which targeted a Starbucks and a large shopping mall in addition to a police station, may also point to a return to focusing on Western targets in the region. The Islamic State may also be expanding its activities into Southeast Asia and elsewhere as a way of internationalizing its struggle and compensating for losses in Syria and Iraq. It may also seek to gain the allegiance of existing Islamist groups as a way of expanding its regional network.

U.S. Interests and Policy Responses

Southeast Asia’s terrorism threat has implications for numerous U.S. interests in Southeast Asia. Since the late 2000s, the region has had growing prominence in U.S. foreign-policy initiatives under the Obama Administration’s “strategic rebalance” to the Asia-Pacific region. U.S. security relations with several Southeast Asian countries have deepened against the backdrop of rising strategic competition with China. Four Southeast Asian states are part of the proposed Trans-Pacific Partnership (TPP) trade agreement, the Obama Administration’s signature regional economic initiative.⁹

Rising Islamist militancy could impact stability and threaten U.S. interests in the region, and beyond, in several ways:

- It could lead to a direct attack against U.S. citizens or interests in the region, as well as against the United States.¹⁰
- It could also act as a catalyst for recruitment for terrorist activity in Southeast Asian countries, increasing risks for both local and Western governments.
- It could serve as an inspiration for those thinking of joining terrorist fighters in Iraq, Syria, or elsewhere.
- It could provide cells that help finance terrorist causes in-country, in the Middle East, and beyond.¹¹
- It could heighten the threat of attack by Islamist militants against U.S. friends and allies in Southeast Asia, which in turn could limit the ways and extent to ⁸ “The Islamic State Expands its Influence in Asia,” Jane’s Intelligence Review, February 1, 2015.

⁹ See CRS Report R44489, The Trans-Pacific Partnership (TPP): Key Provisions and Issues for Congress, coordinated by (name redacted) and (name redacted), and CRS Report R44361, The Trans-Pacific Partnership (TPP): Strategic Implications, coordinated by (name redacted) and (name redacted)

¹⁰ Southeast Asia served as one of the staging grounds for two of the September 11, 2001, hijackers. Al Qaeda operatives living and/or operating in Southeast Asia planned other attacks against the United States.

¹¹ Al Qaeda used its Southeast Asia cells to help finance its global activities, including the September 11 attacks.

which they support U.S.-led coalition activities against the Islamic State and al Qaeda.

- Terrorist attacks have the potential to exacerbate regional tensions, and distract Southeast Asian governments from other initiatives the United States supports.
- An increased U.S. military presence in the region could become a propaganda or physical target for militants.
- The return of foreign terrorist fighters from Iraq and Syria, and the spread of the Islamic State's ideology through social media, could lead to further attacks and threaten friends, allies, and American security interests.

To address terrorist threats emanating from Southeast Asia, the United States is pursuing a variety of efforts to enhance cooperation and build capacity with nations in the region. The United States coordinates, participates in, or advises a number of global and regional counterterrorism-related policymaking or information exchange bodies in which Asian governments participate:

- The Global Counterterrorism Forum is a multilateral body launched in 2011, whose goal is to reduce the vulnerability of people to terrorism by effectively preventing, combating, and prosecuting terrorist acts and countering incitement and recruitment to terrorism;
- The ASEAN Defense Ministers' Meeting Plus (ADMM Plus) Experts' Working Group on Counterterrorism focuses on strengthening security and defense cooperation in the region;
- The United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC) Terrorism Prevention Branch is responsible for providing assistance to countries toward ratification and implementation of legal instruments against terrorism;
- The Association of Southeast Asian Nations Regional Forum (ARF) fosters dialogue and consultation on political and security issues, including regional counterterrorism activities;
- The U.S. Department of State's Regional Strategic Initiative supports Ambassadors and their Country Teams in developing regional approaches to counterterrorism;
- The Financial Action Task Force (FATF) is an international policymaking and standard-setting body dedicated to combating money laundering and terrorist financing; FATF-style regional bodies bring together regional governments to conduct mutual self-assessments and promote best practices;
- Malaysia and Singapore are members of the Global Coalition to Counter ISIL, an informal grouping that grew out of U.N.-centered efforts to combat IS.

U.S. counterterrorism assistance has generally been welcomed by Southeast Asian governments. In testimony before Congress, then-commander of the U.S. Pacific Command, Admiral Samuel Locklear, noted that Southeast Asian perceptions that the region faces heightened risks from the potential return of fighters from the Middle East have led some governments in the region to have a greater appetite for assistance:

... the numbers that are coming back, we don't have good fidelity on that at this point in time. But what it has done, it has opened up our information-sharing with all the countries in the region that are concerned about this problem, which all of them are. And this isn't just a mil-to-mil [military-to-military], this is a whole government agency, FBI, those types of agencies.¹²

Many analysts argue that strategic counterterror responses will need to address the root causes behind Islamist discontent in order to diminish the grievances that may help fuel radicalization.¹³ These root causes have global, regional, national and local components. Tactically, many argue for a focus on enhancing regional counterterror capabilities and networks, tracking released militants, keeping prisons from becoming centers for militant networking and recruitment, controlling porous borders, and contesting social media spaces inhabited by militants.

At times in the past, some Southeast Asian governments have been ambivalent or even resistant to U.S. pressure to be more aggressive in their pursuit of terrorists, in part because of the political sensitivity of the issue with both mainstream Islamic and secular nationalist groups. However, Southeast Asian responses have become more assertive as governments have come to view terrorism and militancy as threats to their own stability. At a November 2015 summit, leaders of the East Asia Summit expressed “grave concern about the spread of violent extremism and terrorism that undermines local communities and threatens peace and security, including in the Asia-Pacific region.”¹⁴

The Obama Administration has placed emphasis on programs that support Combatting Violent Extremism (CVE) in U.S. counter-terrorism assistance strategy. President Obama hosted a Summit on Countering Violent Extremism in Washington DC in February 2015, at which he said:

... we must acknowledge that groups like al Qaeda and ISIL are deliberately targeting their propaganda to Muslim communities, particularly Muslim youth. And Muslim communities, including scholars and clerics, therefore have a responsibility to push back, not just on twisted interpretations of Islam, but also on the lie that we are somehow engaged in a clash of civilizations; that America and the West are somehow at war with Islam or seek to suppress Muslims; or that we are the cause of every ill in the Middle East.¹⁵

In February 2016, the State Department renamed the Bureau of Counterterrorism to the Bureau of Counterterrorism and Countering Violent Extremism. Deputy Secretary of State Blinken said in the February 2016 speech announcing that change that its goal is to “embed this priority into the core of our foreign policy and ensure it is sustained through a more proactive and integrated approach.”¹⁶ Blinken announced that the Administration would seek increased funding for CVE programs, but that such expenditures would not lessen funding for other counter-terrorism programs.

The U.S. government provides Anti-Terrorism Assistance (ATA) out of the Nonproliferation, Anti-Terrorism, Demining, and Related Programs (NADR) foreign assistance account for Indonesia, Malaysia, the Philippines, and Thailand. In Indonesia, NADR-ATA programs provide training and equipment to police officers to build their capacity to deter, detect, and respond to ¹² Admiral Locklear, Testimony Before the House Armed Services Committee, “Military Technology Capability Issues,” April 15, 2015.

¹³ Prebble Q. Ramswell, “The Utilization and Leveraging of Grievances as a Recruitment Tool and Justification for Terroristic Acts Committed by Islamic Extremists,” Small Wars Journal, April 30, 2014.

¹⁴ East Asia Summit Statement on Countering Violent Extremism, November 21, 2015, <http://www.asean.org/storage/images/2015/November/10th-EAS-Outcome/EAS%20Statement%20on%20CVE%20-%20FINAL%2021%20November%202015.pdf>.

¹⁵ White House, “Remarks by the President at the Summit on Countering Violent Extremism,” February 19, 2015.

¹⁶ Department of State, “New Frameworks for Countering Terrorism and Violent Extremism,” February 16, 2016.

terrorist threats. Anti-terrorism assistance to Malaysia focuses on training and border security to prevent foreign terrorists from entering or transiting through Malaysia. In the Philippines, U.S. assistance includes programs to “enhance the strategic and tactical skills, as well as the investigative capabilities, of regional civilian security forces, particularly in Mindanao.” NADR-ATA funding for Thailand aims to help strengthen border controls, train police in hostage negotiation, and bolster explosive ordnance detection capabilities. Other NADR funding for these countries supports combating weapons of mass destruction.¹⁷ (See Table 1.)

In addition to these NADR programs, the Administration’s FY2017 request states that Economic Support Funding “will be used to expand CVE’s counter-narrative and counter-messaging programming to delegitimize the ideology, narratives, tactics, and recruitment efforts of ISIL and other violent extremist groups, targeting in particular communities in the Levant, Gulf, North Africa, Western Balkans and Southeast Asia that are significant sources of foreign fighters.”¹⁸

Table 1. NADR and NADR Anti-Terrorism Assistance (NADR-ATA)

$US thousands

	Indonesia	Malaysia	Philippines	Thailand
FY2015 NADR total (actual)	5,550	1,270	6,100	1,320
• NADR-ATA (actual)	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a
FY2016 NADR total (requested)	5,550	1,270	3,590	1,320
• NADR-ATA (requested)	4,600	800	3,000	650
FY2017 NADR total (requested)	5,450	1,270	3,590	1,270
• NADR-ATA (requested)	4,500	800	3,000	600

Source: Department of State, Congressional Budget Justifications for Foreign Operations, FY2015-17.

Country-Level Issues

Southeast Asia is a diverse region, comprising three Muslim-majority states (Indonesia, Malaysia, and Brunei), and several countries with substantial Muslim minorities (the Philippines, Thailand, Singapore, and Burma). This section will discuss specific issues in Indonesia, the Philippines and Malaysia, the three Southeast Asian countries where observers consider terrorism risks that span borders or are directed at Western targets to be highest. It will also discuss Australia, a nation where the threat of terrorism is at least partly derived from its open immigration policies and links to Southeast Asia. Thailand and Singapore will also be discussed.

¹⁷ Congressional Budget Justification, Foreign Operations, Appendix 2, Fiscal Year 2017.

¹⁸ Congressional Budget Justification, Foreign Operations, Appendix 2, Fiscal Year 2017.

Indonesia

Indonesia is Southeast Asia's most populous nation, and the world's largest Muslim-majority state. It is also the world's third most populous democracy after India and the United States. It has dealt with violent militancy for decades, particularly since the 1940s, when Islamist groups were among the most active forces fighting Dutch colonial troops. Separatist movements in parts of the country, particularly Aceh, have created safe havens for militant groups to operate and recruit.

Some 87% of Indonesia's 253 million people are Sunni Muslims, with the vast majority subscribing to moderate, syncretic forms of the religion. Religious diversity is enshrined in the constitution. However, Indonesia has been the site of several of the region's deadliest terrorist attacks: Several bombings in Jakarta and tourist center Bali hit Western targets in the 2000s, and the January 2016 attack in Jakarta was a signal event for many, demonstrating that the rise of the Islamic State has inspired some militants to conduct attacks in Indonesia.

Figure 2. Indonesia

Source: Graphic created by CRS. Map boundaries and information generated by (name redacted) and (name redacted) using Department of State Boundaries (2011); Esri (2014); Global Administrative Areas (2012); DeLorme (2014); WHO (2005); and NGA (1994).

The Jakarta attack highlighted both strengths and weaknesses in Indonesia's counterterrorism capabilities, observers note, and also offered a window to the heightened risks that the country now faces. Immediately after the attack, Indonesian police officials blamed an Indonesian/Malaysian military arm of IS operating in Syria called Katibah Nusantara, which they said had worked with IS supporters in Indonesia to plan the attacks.¹⁹ Other experts later called that link tenuous, arguing that the attack had been planned and carried out locally, by a group seeking to prove itself to the Islamic State.²⁰ The conflicting reports highlighted Indonesia's difficulty in tracking militant groups that have splintered from larger groups that were active in the 2000s, particularly Jemaah Islamiyah. Some observers noted, however, that the attacks, although lethal, caused comparatively little damage, demonstrating that Indonesia's efforts to weaken the capability of militants may have prevented deeper violence. Others said the response by President Joko Widodo, who condemned the attacks but said "the people should not be afraid and should not be defeated by these terrorist attacks," set a reassuring tone that diminished their overall effect.²¹

¹⁹ Joe Cochrane, "More on Katibah Nusantara: Military Unit Under ISIS Linked to Jakarta Attack," New York Times, (continued...)

Primary Groups

Virtually all the primary militant groups operating in Indonesia bear links to Jemaah Islamiyah (JI), which experts believe has been substantially degraded since the early 2000s, when it cooperated with Al Qaeda, carried out attacks in Indonesia that killed hundreds, and at one time triggered concerns that it could emerge as a destabilizing regional force. The arrest or killing of numerous JI leaders since 2002 has created a series of smaller, less organized splinter groups. Some terrorism experts argue that such smaller splinter groups may be highly incentivized to undertake future attacks. As one report stated, "Leaders of Indonesia's tiny pro-ISIS camp are competing to prove their fighting credentials."²² Abu Bakar Baasyir, JI's imprisoned intellectual figurehead who had deep Al Qaeda links, made a public declaration of allegiance to IS from prison in July 2014.

Indonesian counterterrorism officials may face an increasingly complex task in identifying and disrupting recruitment networks that are different from the ones they have known over recent years. Some analysts believe that Indonesia's prisons are among the nation's most important centers of terrorist recruitment. According to one report, there were 270 convicted terrorists housed in 26 Indonesian prisons as of January 2015, with another 90 terrorism suspects under detention or awaiting trial at a paramilitary police detention center in suburban Jakarta.²³ According to this report, Indonesian prison authorities have improved their supervision of radical prison inmates in recent years to keep them from forming prison networks. The fact that Baasyir and 23 other prisoners nevertheless were able to publicly pledge loyalty to the Islamic State while under incarceration indicates that the challenges facing Indonesian authorities could be considerable.

Experts generally believe it is difficult to accurately map JI splinter groups and other active groups, given rapidly shifting loyalties. One of the longest-standing and most violent groups active in Indonesia is a small armed group in Poso, Sulawesi, known as Mujahedin Indonesia Timur (Mujahidin of Eastern Indonesia), led by a man named Santoso, alias Abu Wardah, who also calls himself the head of the army of Islamic State in Indonesia. Santoso's organization has reportedly attracted recruits from outside Indonesia, including ethnic Uyghurs (also spelled

(...continued)

January 12, 2016.

²⁰ Sidney Jones, "Disunity Among Indonesian ISIS Supporters and the Risk of More Violence," Institute for the Policy Analysis of Conflict, February 2, 2016.

²¹ Joe Cochrane, "President Joko Widodo of Indonesia Visits Attack Site," New York Times, January 14, 2016; Uri Friedman, "One President's Remarkable Response to Terrorism," The Atlantic, January 15, 2016.

²² Ibid.

²³ Institute for Policy Analysis of Conflict, Support for "Islamic State" in Indonesian Prisons, January 19, 2015.

Uighurs) originally from the People's Republic of China. In March 2016, the incoming head of Indonesia's Anti-Terrorism Agency, Tito Karnavian, identified the fight against militants in Poso as one of his chief priorities.²⁴

The Jakarta attack appears to have been carried out by members of a group known as Partisans of the Caliphate (Jamaah Anshar Khilafah, JAK), whose ideological leader is detained cleric Aman Abdurrahman, a former JI leader.²⁵ Other groups are active in Java, Maluku, Aceh, and elsewhere. One loosely-organized Aceh-based group, known as Jamaah Ansharut Tauhid (JAT), gained prominence in the late 2000s, but was weakened after the Indonesian police raided their training camp in Aceh in February 2010.

In the past, militant recruitment in Indonesia was inspired largely by events at home. International Islamist conflicts, however, have more recently become a source of inspiration for Indonesian militants. Analysts believe the present weakness of Indonesia's largest terror networks is a driver of this development, as weakened militant groups seek to remain relevant. According to some experts, networks that have played roles in recruiting for domestic militant causes are taking on new roles, recruiting and facilitating individuals' travel to Syria via European destinations to fight alongside the IS.²⁶ As an illustration of how loyalties can morph, according to one expert on militant groups in Indonesia, JI is "... refurbishing its reputation as a jihadi organization through its channels to Syrian Islamist rebels."²⁷

State Responses

Indonesia has taken numerous steps to counter the rise of militant groups since 2014, when the Islamic State began to attract greater attention. It has outlawed any public expression of support for IS and blocked numerous websites related to the Islamic State. Indonesia's counterterrorism efforts are police-led, with Detachment 88 (Densus 88)—the elite counterterrorism unit of the police—leading operations and investigations. Counterterrorism units from the Indonesian military are sometimes called upon to support domestic counterterrorism operations and responses.²⁸

One key debate underway in Indonesia is whether the nation's current antiterrorism laws give the national police sufficient ability to monitor and address perceived terrorist threats. Following the January attacks, President Widodo's government has drafted amendments to the current Anti-Terrorism Law, which dates to 2003, the year after the first Bali bombings. The draft amendments have not formally been made public, but press reports say the new legislation could broaden definitions of terrorism and allow police to proactively detain suspected terrorists for up to 90 days without charge or access to legal representation and for longer periods after that. It would also reportedly broaden definitions of criminal support for terrorism, and allow the prosecution of those who travel to the Middle East and are suspected of supporting IS.²⁹

²⁴ Reuters, "Indonesia Gets New Anti-Terror Chief as Threats Rise," March 16, 2016.

²⁵ Jones, op cit.

²⁶ Institute for Policy Analysis of Conflict, Indonesia's Lamongan Network: How East Java, Poso and Syria Are Linked, April 15, 2015.

²⁷ Ibid.

²⁸ U.S. Department of State, Office of the Coordinator for Counterterrorism, Country Reports on Terrorism 2014, June 19, 2015.

²⁹ Jewel Topsfield and Karuni Rompies, "Indonesians Could Be Detained for Six Months Under New Preventative Terror Laws," Sydney Morning Herald, February 15, 2016.

Observers note that Indonesia's largest Muslim organization, Nahdlatul Ulama, has supported a strengthening of counterterrorism laws, which is a departure from its posture when Indonesia drafted its current counterterrorism laws in 2003, and possibly a sign that the mainstream of Indonesian Islamic leaders may now support such measures. However, human rights concerns remain. In early February, Human Rights Watch called on Indonesia to reject amendments to the laws that are "unnecessarily broad and vague," and that would "unjustifiably restrict freedom of expression."³⁰

Counterterrorism Cooperation with the United States and the Region

The United States and Australia have supported the development of Indonesia's counterterrorism capabilities, including helping Indonesia develop the elite counterterrorism unit Detachment 88, responsible for coordinating counterterrorism policy and enforcing Indonesia's antiterrorism laws. The United States has offered training to the leadership and members of the unit, as well as other military and national police personnel. U.S.-Indonesian counterterror capacity-building programs have also included financial intelligence unit training to strengthen anti-money laundering, counterterror intelligence analysts training, an analyst exchange program with the Treasury Department, and training and assistance to establish a border security system as part of the Terrorist Interdiction Program.³¹

Indonesia participates in counterterrorism efforts through several international, multilateral, and regional fora including the U.N., the Global Counterterrorism Forum (GCTF), ASEAN, APEC, and others. In August 2014, with co-chair Australia, Indonesia launched the GCTF's new Working Group on Detention and Reintegration. Indonesia has also participated in the Regional Defense Counter Terrorism Fellowship Program, which includes intelligence cooperation, civil-military cooperation in combating terrorism, and maritime security. Indonesia has also participated in the Theater Security Cooperation Program with the U.S. Pacific Command. This participation has involved Indonesia in counterterrorism seminars promoting cooperation on security as well as subject matter expert exchanges.³²

Philippines

Islamist separatist movements, communist rebels, and terrorist groups primarily in the country's south have battled Philippine military forces for over four decades. In addition to indigenous radical Islamist groups, Al Qaeda had a cell in Manila that was particularly active in the early to mid-1990s, and Jemaah Islamiyah was known to be active in the country in the 1990s and early 2000s. Since 2001, when the Bush Administration designated the Philippines, a predominantly Catholic country, as a front-line state in the global war on terrorism, Islamist terrorist groups and communist militants have been significantly weakened. In recent years, the Armed Forces of the Philippines (AFP), with U.S. assistance, has turned its focus outward, toward the country's international maritime disputes with China, although it continues militarily to engage Islamist terrorist groups such as the Abu Sayyaf Group (ASG) and splinter groups of two Muslim groups, the Moro Islamic Liberation Front (MILF) and the Moro National Liberation Front (MNLF), that operate in the southern Philippines.

³⁰ Human Rights Watch, "Indonesia: Terror Law Amendments Should Not Threaten Rights," February 9, 2016.

³¹ Information drawn from State Department Fact Sheet, "Summary of Counter Terrorism Assistance for Indonesia," October 2003 update.

³² "United States-Indonesia Military Relations," Congressional Record, February 1, 2005, p. S734.

In 2014, the Aquino Administration and the MILF, a separatist insurgency based in western Mindanao and the Sulu archipelago, signed a peace agreement, the Comprehensive Agreement on the Bangsamoro. The resulting Bangsamoro Basic Law (BBL) would provide for substantial political and economic autonomy for the Moro people in parts of Mindanao and Sulu. According to some observers, the BBL also would bring hope of greater security and economic development in areas that have been a breeding ground for insurgent and extremist groups. However, the BBL has not been implemented due to political resistance, especially in the Philippine Congress.

A number of observers have raised concerns about possible strengthening ties among Filipino terrorist groups and growing links between them and the Islamic State. Some Islamist groups in the southern Philippines have expressed support for the Islamic State, hoped to gain financial rewards from foreign jihadist organizations by supporting the Islamic State, or claimed to have links to the Islamic State in order to gain leverage in relation to the Philippine government.³³ Although there have been reports of Filipino Muslims among IS forces in Syria, some experts say that it is more likely that some Filipino overseas workers residing in the Middle East, rather than Filipino Muslims from Mindanao, have joined the Islamic State.³⁴ Some analysts believe that the ASG and splinter groups of the MILF and MNLF, which signed its own peace agreement with the Philippine government in 1996, potentially may commit “sympathy attacks” or offer safe haven to pan-Islamist terrorist groups or individuals from the Southeast Asia region that have ties to ISIS.³⁵ Some Philippine military officials and other analysts characterize terrorist activity in the southern Philippines as small-scale and sporadic, including occasional kidnappings for ransom, ambushes on military forces and government property, and bombings.³⁶

Primary Groups

The most established, indigenous terrorist organization in the Philippines is the Abu Sayyaf Group based in Sulu. At its peak in the mid-2000s, the ASG posed a significant terrorist threat and maintained ties with Jemaah Islamiyah and factions of the MILF. The ASG has carried out hostage-takings for ransom, killings, and bombings since the early 1990s and provided sanctuary for JI. Members of the ASG, JI, and, to a lesser extent, the MILF are believed to have maintained tenuous links with Al Qaeda.³⁷ The February 2004 bombing of a ferry in Manila Bay, which killed over 100 people, was found to be the work of Abu Sayyaf and the Rajah Solaiman Movement (RSM), another militant organization based in the southern Philippines. In February 2005, the ASG and RSM carried out simultaneous bombings in three cities, which killed 16 people, while ³³ Carmela Fonbuena, “PH Military Downplays Abu Sayyaf Allegiance to ISIS,” Rappler.com, August 6, 2014; Michelle FlorCruz, “Philippine Terror Group Abu Sayyaf May Be Using ISIS Link for Own Agenda,” International Business Times, September 25, 2014; “Philippine Rebels Threaten Hostages’ Lives,” Al Jazeera, September 26, 2014.

³⁴ Edd K. Usman, “Some Filipino Muslims in Saudi Plan to Join ISIS, Says Source in Jeddah,” Manila Bulletin, August 29, 2014; Bong Lozada, “BIFF Has Not Sent Men to ISIS, Says AFP,” Inquirer.net, September 30, 2014; Steven Rood, Asia Foundation, March 2, 2016.

³⁵ Roel Panreno, “AFP on High Alert for ‘Sympathy Attacks’ over US Airstrikes vs ISIS,” Philippine Star, September 11, 2014; Rigoberto D. Tiglao, “MILF Must Categorically Condemn ISIS Now,” Manila Times, September 28, 2014; “Editorial: The ISIS Threat,” Philippine Star, September 29, 2014.

³⁶ U.S. Department of State, Office of the Coordinator for Counterterrorism, Country Reports on Terrorism 2014, June 19, 2015.

³⁷ The ASG reportedly provided support to Ramzi Yousef, a Pakistani Al Qaeda agent convicted of planning the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center. In 1994, Yousef rented an apartment in Manila where he made plans and explosives in an attempt to blow up 11 U.S. passenger jets simultaneously over the Pacific Ocean. Preeti Bhattacharji, “Terrorist Havens: Philippines,” Council on Foreign Relations Backgrounder, June 1, 2009. Zachary Abuza, “Balik-Terrorism: The Return of the Abu Sayyaf,” Strategic Studies Institute, September 2005.

the Philippine government uncovered plots to carry out additional attacks in Manila, including one targeting the United States Embassy. According to the State Department, over time, the ASG has become more of a criminal organization rather than an ideological one, funded by kidnappings for ransom, extortion, and drug trafficking. Its membership has decreased from an estimated 1,000 in 2002 to 300-400 members.³⁸

Other groups that have expressed support for ISIS and continue to be targets of Philippine military pressure include MILF splinter groups such as the Bangsamoro Islamic Freedom Fighters (BIFF) and followers of MNLF founder Nur Misuari who do not support the Mindanao peace agreement. Another group, Ansar al-Khilafah (Supporters of the Caliphate) in the Philippines (AKP), based in southern Mindanao, is believed to include former MILF commanders and to be linked to both the BIFF and Jemaah Islamiyah. The AKP reportedly has pledged allegiance to the Islamic State and warned of attacks on civilian targets. Some Philippine military officials view the AKP largely as a criminal gang that preys on local farmers through extortion and engages in drug trafficking, with little military power and “no proven links” to the Islamic State.³⁹

Figure 3. Philippines

Source: Graphic created by CRS. Map boundaries and information generated by (name redacted) and (name redacted) using Department of State Boundaries (2011); Esri (2014); Global Administrative Areas (2012); DeLorme (2014); and NGA (2006).

Philippines military officials have stated that they have not been able to confirm IS recruitment in the Philippines and that it is unlikely that the Islamic State has established an outpost in ³⁸ Country Reports on Terrorism 2014, op. cit.

³⁹ Tom Wyke, “ISIS Unveil the Philippines as Their New Breeding Ground for Jihadis with Their Latest Propaganda Video Featuring a Secret Filipino Jungle Training Camp,” Mailonline, December 21, 2015.

Mindanao.⁴⁰ The Philippine government has downplayed reports of a video purportedly showing an IS training camp in a jungle area in Mindanao.⁴¹ The Aquino Administration and local government officials have acknowledged that loose, low-level contacts between Filipino Islamist extremists and the Islamic State may exist, although they also have expressed confidence that the Philippine military, with the cooperation of the MILF, can prevent such ties from rising to significant levels.⁴² The MILF reportedly has formed a task force to counter IS recruitment activities in Mindanao.⁴³ Military officials have asserted that they have not picked up credible or specific terrorist threats, but continue to monitor extremist groups in the region.⁴⁴

In the past year, the ASG has demonstrated a renewed willingness to strengthen its forces and engage in acts of violence, although the government has maintained a capacity to respond militarily. The ASG reportedly has pledged support to the IS and selected new leadership who vow to unite violent Islamist groups in the Philippines.⁴⁵ Following a decline during the previous few years, kidnappings for ransom increased in 2015-2016. The group's recent hostages have included 24 foreigners, some of whom have been released and some killed. In November 2015, the ASG beheaded a Malaysian man who had been abducted from a restaurant in Sabah, eastern Malaysia. In April 2016, the group decapitated a Canadian man whom the group had kidnapped, along with a Filipina and two other foreigners, from a Mindanao resort.⁴⁶

State Responses

The government's recent counterterrorism efforts have included military, legal, and ideological components. The Anti-Terrorism Council, created in 2007, has worked with the MILF to counter terrorist threats, particularly ones with potential links to the Islamic State. Cooperation with the MILF includes programs in Islamic schools to counter extremist ideas.⁴⁷ In 2015, a Philippine court designated Abu Sayyaf as a terrorist organization, thereby providing the government with greater legal and economic tools with which to combat the group.⁴⁸

⁴⁰ "ISIS Satellite Extension in Mindanao 'Unlikely'—Military," GMA News Online, January 12, 2016.

⁴¹ "Rigoberto Tiglao, "UK Newspaper: 'PHL New Breeding Ground for ISIS Jihadis,'" Manila Times, December 22, 2015; Francisco Tuyay, "4 Jihadist Camps for ISIS Recruits," The Standard, November 30, 2015; Sandy Araneta, Florante S. Solmerin, and Francisco Tuyay, "Palace Denies Jihadist Camps," The Standard, December 23, 2015. JI at one point operated camps in the southern Philippines.

⁴² "ISIS in the Philippines," Manila Standard, October 10, 2014; Victor Reyes and Raymond Africa, "No ISIS Members in ARMM, Says Gov; but Sympathizers Are Aplenty, Drawn from Abu Sayyaf, BIFF," Malaya, September 29, 2014; "Gov't Probes ISIS Training in Zambo," The Philippines Star, March 25, 2015.

⁴³ Jeffrey Maitem, "MILF Forms Task Force to Fight Off Recruitment for ISIS," Inquirer.net, January 2016.

⁴⁴ Jaime Laude, "AFP Raises Alert over Jakarta Bombings," The Philippine Star, January 15, 2016

⁴⁵ Moh Saaduddin, "Abu Sayyaf Rebels Officially Vow Allegiance to ISIS," Manila Times, January 11, 2016.

⁴⁶ Rene Acosta, "Abu Sayyaf Bandits Demand P1 Billion for 3 Foreigners, Filipina Captives," Business Mirror, February 12, 2016; Zachary Abuza, "Trouble in the Southern Philippines: Problems and Prospects," The Diplomat, April 28, 2016.

⁴⁷ Aurea Calica and Roel Pareno, "Gov't MILF Working vs Islamic State," The Philippine Star, September 28, 2014.

⁴⁸ Jim Gomez, "Philippine Court Designates Abu Sayyaf's Terrorist Group," Associated Press, September 10, 2015. The United States designated the ASG a terrorist organization in 1997.

Elena L. Aben, "Military Captures Encampment in Week-Long Offensive in Basilan," Manila Bulletin, December 21, 2015.

"8 Gunmen Carrying ISIS Flags Killed in Clash in Sultan Kudarat Town," Philippine Daily Inquirer, November 26, 2015.

In December 2015, the AFP killed 26 ASG militants and a Malaysian man with purported links to the Islamic State during a week-long offensive on Basilan island. Three AFP soldiers also were killed.⁴⁹ Eight AKP members, possibly including leader Mohammad Jaafar Maguid as well as an Indonesian national, reportedly were killed in a battle with AFP forces in Sulu in November 2015.⁵⁰

Counterterrorism Cooperation with the United States and the Region

Between the mid-2000s and the early 2010s, evidence of organizational ties between Filipino Islamist groups and Middle Eastern terrorist networks decreased, due in large part to joint counterterrorism operations involving the Philippine Armed Forces and the U.S. military. Over the past decade, roughly half of U.S. development assistance to the Philippines has supported efforts to address the “root causes of terrorism” in Mindanao. Between 2002 and 2014, the U.S. Joint Special Operations Task Force–Philippines (JSOTF-P), a rotating force of roughly 500 U.S. military personnel, assisted the AFP in its fight against the Abu Sayyaf Group. Philippine-U.S. counterterrorism cooperation, including both military and humanitarian efforts, helped to reduce the membership, potency, and ideological influence of the ASG.⁵¹

Joint Special Operations Task Force–Philippines (JSOTF-P)

Based in temporary facilities in western Mindanao and Jolo, JSOTF-P advised and assisted two Philippine Regional Combatant Commands at a cost of about $50 million annually. The mission had four main counterinsurgency and counterterrorism objectives: deny insurgent/terrorist sanctuary; deny insurgent/terrorist mobility; deny insurgent/terrorist access to resources; and separate the population from the insurgent/terrorist. Related activities included military training, intelligence operations, casualty evacuation and care, and humanitarian and development assistance. Some JSOTF-P personnel supported relief efforts in Leyte province following Typhoon Yolanda (Haiyan) in November 2013.

U.S. JSOTF-P forces began to withdraw in 2014, due to several factors: the weakening of the Abu Sayyaf Group; the improving capabilities of Philippine military forces; and the peace agreement between the Government of the Philippines and the Moro Islamic Liberation Front. However, the government’s implementation of its plan to transition from military to police forces in Mindanao reportedly has been “slow and ineffective” and violent extremist activity, including attacks against public and private property, remains a problem.⁵²

A lack of economic opportunities continues to help foster a breeding ground for extremist ideologies, groups, and recruitment and well as corruption and criminal activities, particularly in the southern Philippines, according to some experts.⁵³ Other observers argue that political opposition to the Bangsamoro Basic Law may lead to a rise in recruits to the ASG, the BFF, and other Islamist groups in Mindanao and Sulu.⁵⁴ For over the past decade, roughly half of U.S. development assistance to the Philippines has supported efforts to address the “root causes of ⁴⁹ Elena L. Aben, “Military Captures Encampment in Week-Long Offensive in Basilan,” Manila Bulletin, December 21, 2015.

⁵⁰ “8 Gunmen Carrying ISIS Flags Killed in Clash in Sultan Kudarat Town,” Philippine Daily Inquirer, November 26, 2015.

⁵¹ Country Reports on Terrorism 2014, op. cit.

⁵² Ibid.

⁵³ Amy Chew, “Ransoms Bankrolling Abu Sayyaf; Malaysian State of Sabah Faces More Risk of Kidnappings to Fund Militant Group’s Arms for Terrorist Activities, Security Experts Warn,” South China Morning Post, November 29, 2015.

⁵⁴ Carmelito Q. Francisco and Alden M. Monzon, “Without Passing Bangsamoro Law, More Muslims May Join Radical Groups,” BusinessWorld Online, December 20, 2015.

terrorism” in Mindanao. Program areas have included promoting broad-based economic growth; building local government capacity to deliver basic services; improving governmental transparency and accountability; providing basic education; and supporting civil society.⁵⁵

State Department countering violent extremism (CVE) programs in the Philippines include strengthening the ability of law enforcement to engage local communities, identifying youth with the potential of becoming radicalized, and supporting community efforts to build inter-ethnic harmony.⁵⁶ State Department antiterrorism assistance efforts focus on training programs for the Philippine National Police in strategic and tactical skills as well as investigative capabilities. Other areas include cyber forensic investigations, crisis response, and explosive ordnance disposal.⁵⁷ The Philippines military also is to receive $33 million in Department of Defense counterterrorism assistance for intelligence, surveillance, and reconnaissance (ISR) support, two aircraft, and training.⁵⁸

The Enhanced Defense Cooperation Agreement (EDCA), finalized between the two governments in April 2014 and sanctioned by the Philippine Supreme Court in January 2016, allows for the increased presence of U.S. military forces, ships, aircraft, and equipment in the Philippines on a rotational basis and U.S. access to Philippine military bases. Although the main purpose of greater military cooperation is to help the AFP to establish a “credible security presence and awareness in the maritime domain,” in light of territorial disputes with China in the South China Sea, it also supports continued counterterrorism cooperation.⁵⁹ The Philippines has offered five military bases for U.S. access under EDCA, including Lumbia Air Base in southern Mindanao. The inclusion of Lumbia reportedly reflected concerns about terrorism and efforts by ISIS to influence local militants in that region.⁶⁰

Malaysia

Unlike many of its neighbors in Southeast Asia, Malaysia does not appear to have indigenous separatist groups or insurgents that engage in terrorist activities. Violent Islamist extremist groups have held meetings in or channeled funds and supplies through Malaysia in scattered instances over the past 25 years, but Malaysian law enforcement appears to have been successful in preventing any of those groups from gaining a foothold in the country.⁶¹ However, Malaysia is not immune to the consequences of the Islamic State’s rise.

Primary Groups

Malaysia faces terrorist threats on three levels: fighters returning from conflict zones, strengthening of regional terrorist groups, and radicalization of individuals (including, for example, the possibility of “lone wolf” attacks).

⁵⁵ U.S. Department of State: Congressional Budget Justification for Foreign Operations, Fiscal Year 2016, Appendix 2 and Congressional Budget Justification for Foreign Operations, Fiscal Year 2017, Appendix 2.

⁵⁶ Department of State, Bureau of Counterterrorism, July 2015.

⁵⁷ Congressional Budget Justification for Foreign Operations, Fiscal Year 2017, op. cit.

⁵⁸ Consolidated Appropriations Act, 2016 (P.L. 114-113, Division C).

⁵⁹ See Testimony by Dr. Peter Lavy, Acting Assistant Secretary of Defense, before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Terrorism, Nonproliferation and Trade, February 7, 2012.

⁶⁰ Trefor Moss, “U.S. Set to Deploy Troops to Philippines in Rebalancing Act,” Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2016.

⁶¹ In 1999 and 2000, some of the September 11 plotters used Kuala Lumpur for important strategy meetings. The 9/11 Commission Report, WW. Norton & Company: New York, pp. 156-160.

Figure 4. Malaysia

Source: Graphic created by CRS. Map boundaries and information generated by (name redacted) and (name redacted) using Department of State Boundaries (2011); Esri (2014); Global Administrative Areas (2012); DeLorme (2014); and NGA (2007).

Some Malaysians reportedly have provided funds to some insurgent and terrorist groups in Iraq and Syria, have facilitated others' support of these groups, and some have traveled to Iraq and Syria to fight or serve on the front lines. Reliable figures are not available, but most news reports cite estimates of 100 or more Malaysians actively working with the Islamic State or rebel groups in the Middle East.⁶² Some Malaysians have provided small-scale financial support to insurgent and terrorist groups in the Middle East. According to police reports, most financial transfers that support or potentially support militant groups are conducted with cash or through the hawala informal value transfer system,⁶³ making it difficult to completely stop funding of terrorist groups.⁶⁴ The Malaysian government's 2014 White Paper on the threat of the Islamic State noted, ⁶² John Hudson, "Why Does Malaysia Have an Islamic State Problem?" Foreign Policy, September 9, 2015.

⁶³ Hawala refers to an informal method for transferring funds that is commonly used in parts of the Middle East and South Asia where the formal banking system has limited presence. A hawala transfer typically involves a network of trusted money brokers, or hawaladars, who rely on each other to accept and disburse funds to third-party clients on their behalf. Settlement of account balances among hawaladars takes place subsequently, but not necessarily through bank and non-bank financial institutions. Such informal value transfer systems are often preferred because of their perceived quickness, reliability, and lower cost. Unregulated hawala systems, however, are perceived by government authorities as lacking sufficient transparency and investigations have revealed that they are vulnerable to abuse by terrorist groups. See U.S. Department of the Treasury, Financial Crimes Enforcement Network (FinCEN), "Informal Value Transfer Systems," Advisory, FIN-2010-A011, September 1, 2010.

⁶⁴ "Supporters Funding Militants, Terrorists with Cash," Bernama, September 25, 2014.

“Malaysia is seen to be at risk of becoming a terrorism financing hub if existing laws are not effective to curb the flow of financial resources to assist the movements of militants abroad.”⁶⁵

The practice of Islam in Malaysia is generally regarded by many observers as relatively moderate.⁶⁶ Nevertheless, the Islamic State, as well as websites and social media pages supportive of it, has drawn support from some extremists and elicited fascination in Malaysian youth. Malaysian IS supporters and sympathizers are active online and, some argue, create a fertile environment for recruitment and further radicalization.⁶⁷ According to a Pew Research Center survey conducted in spring 2015, 67% of Malaysian Muslims have an unfavorable opinion of IS, but 12% have a favorable opinion.⁶⁸ The opposition Pan-Malaysia Islamic Party (known by its Malay acronym PAS) publicly disavowed support for IS, but in 2014 senior PAS figures had praised the “sacrifice” of a former PAS youth leader who died fighting in Syria.⁶⁹

State Responses

Malaysian Prime Minister Najib Razak and other senior government officials have denounced the Islamic State and have urged Malaysians to withhold support for it and related groups. It was not until September 2014 that the Malaysian government began to freeze assets and funds belonging to individuals or groups involved with the Islamic State. The National Fatwa Council ruled in October 2014 that the participation of Malaysian Muslims in militant groups in Iraq and Syria is contrary to Islamic law and their deaths are not categorized as martyrdom.⁷⁰ Malaysia, then a member of the Security Council, fully supported U.N. Security Council Resolution 2178, which aims to galvanize international action to combat terrorism in general and the problems posed by foreign terrorist fighters in particular.⁷¹ At the same time, the Malaysian government urged the United States and European countries to address the underlying factors that produce terrorism and to win “hearts and minds” rather than solely using force to counter terrorism. In a speech to the U.N. General Assembly in 2014, Najib promoted Malaysia’s model of moderate Islam and encouraged individuals, religious leaders, and nations “to advocate for Islamic principles within a framework of tolerance, understanding and peace.”⁷²

The emerging danger of terrorists connected to the Islamic State and similar groups has prompted Malaysian law enforcement authorities to be more vigilant. Along with many other South and Southeast Asian countries, Malaysia fears that experienced and radicalized jihadists will return from Syria and Iraq to carry out attacks in their home country; Malaysian officials have raised the possibility of a “Paris-style” attack. The head of the police counterterrorism unit said that IS veterans are “also planning to carry out attacks in Malaysia against the Malaysian government, because for them Malaysia is not an Islamic government; it is OK to topple Malaysia through ⁶⁵ “Ke Arah Menangani Acaman Kumpulan Islamic State (Addressing the Islamic State Threat),” Government of Malaysia White Paper, November 26, 2014. Unofficial translation.

⁶⁶ Nazry Bahrawi, “Moderate Islam in Southeast Asia and Egypt,” East Asia Forum, October 28, 2011.

⁶⁷ Muhammad Haziq Bin Jani, “Urgent Need to Counter Malaysia’s ‘Cyber-ISIS,’” New Straits Times, March 31, 2016.

⁶⁸ Jacob Poushter, “In Nations with Significant Muslim Populations, Much Disdain for ISIS,” Pew Research Center, Fact Tank blog, November 17, 2015.

⁶⁹ “Many Muslim Youths Keen on Jihad with ISIS—Abim,” Malaysian Insider, September 17, 2014.

⁷⁰ “Ke Arah Menangani Acaman Kumpulan Islamic State (Addressing the Islamic State Threat),” Government of Malaysia White Paper, November 26, 2014. Unofficial translation.

⁷¹ A. Jalil Hamid, “Malaysia rejects extremism, says Najib,” New Straits Times, September 26, 2014.

⁷² Dato’ Sri Mohd Najib Bin Tun Haji Abdul Razak, “Speech at the General Debate of the 69th UN General Assembly,” Remarks as prepared for delivery in New York, September 26, 2014.

armed struggle.”⁷³ Police have apprehended several Malaysian militants returning from Syria and have arrested dozens of other Malaysians who allegedly intended to emigrate from Malaysia to join terrorist groups in the Middle East. As of mid-March 2016, Malaysian authorities have detained over 160 people connected to the Islamic State.⁷⁴

Malaysia, like others, faces the threat that IS ideology will inspire individuals to carry out their own attacks and/or form militant groups in the country, even without connections to existing terrorist groups. In August 2014, Malaysian police arrested 19 people involved with a group plotting what officials called “amateurish” bombings against domestic targets and arrested another 17 suspects on similar charges in April 2015.⁷⁵ According to the Malaysian government, a group inspired by the Islamic State plotted to kidnap Prime Minister Najib and other senior figures, but the police foiled the plan.⁷⁶ Malaysian authorities are particularly concerned that the territories of Sabah and Sarawak could become a haven for terrorist groups or come under threat from rejuvenated militant groups in nearby areas of the Philippines and Indonesia. Malaysia’s 2015 defense budget indicates a shift of attention and resources to Sabah, including two new battalions and new police and military outposts there.⁷⁷

In response to intensified concerns about terrorism in Malaysia, the Najib government secured passage of new anti-terrorism legislation, the Prevention of Terrorism Act (POTA), in April 2015. This new law provides sweeping powers to law enforcement authorities to detain suspects without trial for up to 60 days, extendable indefinitely with approval from a Prevention of Terrorism panel. The POTA is especially controversial because the Malaysian government gained these enhanced police powers at a time when many see a growing crackdown on political dissent.⁷⁸ Many observers inside and outside of Malaysia, including the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, have raised serious concerns about the institution of indefinite detention without trial and the potential for abuse.⁷⁹ Malaysian officials assert that POTA provides law enforcement measures that are necessary for countering the more dangerous terrorist threat.

Counterterrorism Cooperation with the United States and the Region

In response to the increased risks, in 2014 Malaysia stepped up its counterterrorism cooperation with other Southeast Asian countries and with the United States. The Malaysian Minister of Defense emphasized the need for greater intelligence sharing with Australia, Middle Eastern countries, Indonesia, and the Philippines.⁸⁰ The Malaysian Home Minister traveled to the United States in October 2014 to meet with officials in the FBI and Department of Homeland Security, stating, “We exchange information about the involvement of Malaysians who are suspected of being terrorists and foreign terrorists who allegedly used Malaysia as a transit to move to other ⁷³ Mahi Ramakrishnan, “Malaysia Struggles to Stop People Joining Jihad,” Voice of America, September 30, 2014.

⁷⁴ “162 Detained in Connection with Daesh Terrorist Group—Home Ministry,” Bernama, March 24, 2016.

⁷⁵ “Southeast Asia Increasingly Worried with Islamic State’s Alluring Appeal,” Agence France Presse, September 30, 2014; “Malaysia Detains 17 Suspected of Plotting Attacks: Police Chief,” Reuters, April 6, 2015.

⁷⁶ Hemananthani Sivanandam and Loshana K. Shagar, “Najib, Zahid, Hisham on IS Kidnap List,” Star, March 8, 2016.

⁷⁷ Nigel Cory, “Malaysia’s Defense Budget: A Push to the East,” CSIS CogitAsia blog, December 19, 2014, <http://cogitasia.com/malaysias-defense-budget-a-push-to-the-east>.

⁷⁸ Jeremy Grant, “Rights Groups Condemn Malaysia Sedition Arrests,” Financial Times, March 31, 2015.

⁷⁹ Nick Cumming-Bruce, “U.N. Rights Chief Criticizes Malaysian Antiterror Measure,” New York Times, April 9, 2015; “Terrorism in Malaysia: Lurch to Illiberalism,” Economist, April 11, 2015.

⁸⁰ Roy Goh, “Hisham: Boost Intel Sharing to Stem IS Threat,” New Straits Times, September 22, 2014.

countries.”⁸¹ In September 2015, Malaysia agreed to join the U.S.-led Global Coalition to Counter ISIL and participate in the coalition’s counter-messaging group. Malaysia plans to establish a Regional Digital Counter-Messaging Communication Center by May 2016 to counter IS messages on social media and to present more appealing alternatives; the United Arab Emirates created a similar center last year.⁸² Malaysia already hosts the Southeast Asia Regional Center for Counterterrorism (SEARCCT), which conducts counterterrorism training workshops for regional officials and hosted an ASEAN Regional Forum workshop on counter-radicalization in March 2015.

Malaysia established its Advanced Passenger Screening System in 2014. In 2015, Malaysia signed the U.S. Homeland Security Presidential Directive No. 6 and a bilateral agreement for Preventing and Combating Serious Crime, which provide for the exchange of information (even biometric and DNA data) on suspected terrorists between U.S. and Malaysian law enforcement authorities.⁸³ The Malaysian Home Minister stated in March 2016 that the Immigration Department had fulfilled the condition to transmit reports within 24 hours to Interpol on any loss or theft of Malaysian passports.⁸⁴

Thailand

Thailand is at risk of terrorism for several reasons: a homegrown separatist insurgency in its majority-Muslim southern provinces, relatively open and long borders that allow for international transit of transnational actors and a proliferation of human trafficking networks, and a central government consumed with its own political challenges.⁸⁵ A U.S. treaty ally since 1954, Thailand has been shaken by extensive political turmoil and two military coups in the past nine years. Since the May 2014 coup, former Army Commander Prayuth Chan-ocha has served as Prime Minister and head of the military junta known as the National Council for Peace and Order (NCPO). Although Prayuth declared an end to martial law on April 1, 2015, the junta retains authoritarian powers under a special security measure in the interim constitution. The NCPO has not set a date for new elections, saying that political reform must first be accomplished. The elections are not expected to be scheduled until at least July 2017, and many observers think that the junta is unwilling to relinquish power even if the polls are held.

Primary Groups

Thailand has endured a persistent separatist insurgency in its Muslim-majority southern provinces since the 1940s. The conflict has been particularly active in the last decade; since 2004, violence involving insurgents and security forces has left around 6,500 people dead and over 11,000 wounded, according to local NGOs.⁸⁶ Experts consider the goals of the militant groups active in ⁸¹ “Militants Target Sabah, Sarawak,” Berita Harian, September 29, 2014.

⁸² According to reports, the United States will provide technology, expertise, and some funding for Malaysia’s Regional Digital Counter-Messaging Communication Center. Prashanth Parameswaran, “Exclusive: US, Malaysia and the War Against the Islamic State,” Diplomat, November 25, 2015.

⁸³ Prashanth Parameswaran, “Exclusive: US, Malaysia and the War Against the Islamic State,” Diplomat, November 25, 2015.

⁸⁴ Hafizah Kamaruddin, “U.S. Tightens VWP Conditions After Terror Attacks in Europe, Turkey,” Bernama, March 31, 2016.

⁸⁵ Some of the 9/11 hijackers help important planning meetings in Bangkok. . The 9/11 Commission Report, WW. Norton & Company: New York, pp. 156-160.

⁸⁶ “Thailand Must Do More to End Bloodshed in Deep South: NGO Leader,” BenarNews. January 8, 2016.

the area to be mostly separatist rather than jihadist or anti-Western.⁸⁷ Many observers stress that there is no convincing evidence of serious Jemaah Islamiyah involvement in the attacks, and that the overall long-term goal of the movement in the south remains the creation of an independent state with Islamic governance. Some of the older insurgent organizations, which previously were linked to JI, reportedly have received financial support from foreign Islamic groups, and have leaders who have trained in camps in Libya and Afghanistan.⁸⁸ The insurgency has, at times, heightened tensions between Thailand and Malaysia, since many of the insurgents' leaders are thought to cross the border fairly easily. Despite these links, foreign elements do not appear to have engaged significantly in the violence.⁸⁹

Terrorist threats to Thailand are not limited to the southern provinces. On August 17, 2015, a bomb exploded in a busy Bangkok shopping area, killing 20 and wounding over 120. Two Chinese nationals allegedly linked to the Uyghur militant groups were arrested for involvement in the attack. Uyghurs are an ethnic group living primarily in northwestern China that have been subjected to “severe official repression” by Beijing, according to the State Department’s Human Rights Report. Thai authorities claim that the attack was motivated by the repatriation of a large group of ethnic Uyghurs to China weeks before and Bangkok’s dismantling of a human trafficking ring.

State Responses

Successive governments in Bangkok—consumed by the political turmoil in Bangkok for the past decade—have struggled to contain the conflict in the South. As the current military government remains preoccupied with its steps toward restoring democratic rule, its strategy to contain conflict in the South has yielded some success, with violence declining in the past two years. Efforts include training local leaders to help protect and patrol their communities from insurgents and participating in peace talks with an umbrella organization of six separatist groups brokered by Malaysia.

Counterterrorism Cooperation with the United States and the Region

The United States and Thailand have had strong intelligence cooperation, but it is unclear if the tension between the countries due to the military coups has prompted a downgrade of that aspect of the relationship. After the September 11, 2001, attacks on the United States, the two countries’ intelligence agencies reportedly shared facilities and information daily.⁹⁰ The most public result of enhanced coordination was the arrest of suspected Jemaah Islamiyah leader Hambali outside of Bangkok in August 2003. The CIA also maintained at least one black site—where terrorist suspects can be held beyond U.S. jurisdiction—in Thailand.⁹¹ It is unclear whether this degree of cooperation has continued as Bangkok has reacted to criticism from the United States about Thailand’s suspension of democratic rule. Given Thailand’s geographical position and relatively ⁸⁷ “Southern Thailand: Dialogue in Doubt,” International Crisis Group Asia Report No. 270, July 8, 2015.

⁸⁸ Zachary Abuza, “A Breakdown of Southern Thailand’s Insurgent Groups,” Terrorism Monitor, September 8, 2006.

⁸⁹ Jayshree Bajoria and Carin Zissis, “The Muslim Insurgency in Southern Thailand,” Council on Foreign Relations Backgrounder, September 10, 2008.

⁹⁰ Crispin, Shawn, and Leslie Lopez, “U.S. and Thai Agents Collaborate in Secret—Cold-War-Style Alliance Strikes Jemaah Islamiyah Where It Least Expects It,” Asian Wall Street Journal, October 1, 2003.

⁹¹ Nazaryan, Alexander, “CIA Torture Report’s Abu Zubaydah Surprised the Truth Came Out,” Newsweek, December 16, 2014; Miller, Greg and Adam Goldman, “Rise and Fall of CIA’s Overseas Prisons Traced in Senate Report on Interrogations,” Washington Post, December 11, 2014.

open borders that cater to the large tourism industry, intelligence sharing with Bangkok could be a valuable resource in tracking the movement of transnational operatives.

Australia

Muslim radicals represent an extremely small part of Australia's minority Islamic population. Australia has approximately half a million Muslims out of a total population of approximately 23.5 million.⁹² While Afghan camaleers were among the first Muslims in Australia, many of Australia's Muslims today are of Lebanese, Turkish, Bosnian, Syrian, or other descent. According to one report, 60% of those embracing radicalism in Australia are of Lebanese heritage.⁹³ The vast majority of Australia's Muslims are moderate in their beliefs. By one estimate Islamist radicals represent 0.2% of the Muslim population of Australia.⁹⁴ Others in Australia emphasize that "radicalisation and terrorism are two different phenomena" and that counter-radicalization is but one of many counterterror policy options.⁹⁵ The history of radical Islamist inspired attacks in Australia can be traced to 1915 when two men of Afghan and Pakistani background attacked a train near Broken Hill, New South Wales, killing four and wounding seven. The attack was motivated by religious grievances over the prohibition of halal slaughter and political allegiance to the Ottoman Sultan, with whom Australia as a part of the British Empire was then at war.⁹⁶

Primary Groups

Terrorist activity in Australia appears to have increased in recent years due to the effects the Islamic State has had on Islamist militants. The increase in militant activity takes the form of recruitment of those who would fight for the Islamic State in Syria and Iraq, the provision of financial or other support to those fighting with the Islamic State in the Middle East, and domestic terrorist attacks carried out by individuals and groups who have followed the Islamic State on social media or possibly have been influenced at Islamic centers in Australia.

Other radical Islamist militant groups originating outside Australia have also been active in Australia or called on jihadists to target Australia. Examples of such activity include an unsuccessful Al Qaeda and Indonesia-based Jemaah Islamiyah (JI) directed plot to attack Jewish and Israeli targets in Sydney during the 2000 Olympics, a Lashkar-e-Taiba (LeT) plot that was foiled in 2003,⁹⁷ and a similarly thwarted 2009 Al Shabab associated plot to attack the Holsworthy Army Barracks in Sydney.⁹⁸ Al Qaeda has also mentioned Australia when calling for attacks against the United States and its allies.⁹⁹

⁹² "What's the Fastest Growing Religion in Australia?" SBS News, November 13, 2015, <http://www.sbs.com.au>. Australians believe Muslims constitute 18% of Australia's population when in fact Muslims represent approximately 2% of the population. Michael Safi, "Australians Think Muslim Population Is Nine Times Greater Than It Really Is," The Guardian, October 29, 2014.

⁹³ "Who Are Australia's Radicalised Muslims?" BBC News, March 12, 2015.

⁹⁴ Halim Rane, "Muslim Radicalisation: Where Does the Responsibility Rest?" ABC News, <http://www.abc.net.au>.

⁹⁵ Greg Austin, "Narrow Focus on Radicalisation Won't Stop Terrorists," The Conversation, <http://www.theconversation.com>.

⁹⁶ "Battle of Broken Hill," <http://www.brokenhillaustralia.com>.

⁹⁷ The Lashkar-e-Taiba is based in Pakistan. Australian Government, "Lashkar-e-Tayyiba," Australian National Security, <https://www.nationalsecurity.gov.au>.

⁹⁸ Al-Shabab is based in East Africa. Andrew Zammit, "The Holsworthy Barracks Plot: A Case Study of an Al-Shabab Support Network in Australia," June 21, 2012, <https://www.ctc.usma.edu>.

⁹⁹ Australian Government, "Al-Qaida," Australian National Security, <https://www.nationalsecurity.gov.au>.

Terrorists also have targeted Australians in neighboring Indonesia. Two of the largest attacks in Indonesia, both attributed to JI, were centered on Australian targets: An October 12, 2002, bombing of two crowded nightclubs in Bali killed 88 Australians and seven Americans, and JI carried out a bombing of the Australian Embassy in Jakarta in September 2004. (JI also carried out attacks on other Western targets, both in Jakarta and Bali.) Some within JI at that time reportedly set as their goal the establishment of an Islamic state that would encompass Indonesia, Malaysia, the southern Philippines, and Northern Australia.

The Lowy Institute, known as Australia's most prominent think tank, estimated in February 2015 that "around 90 Australians were fighting for Jihadist groups in Syria and Iraq, that up to 30 have returned, and that over 20 have died."¹⁰⁰ Between December 2014 and October 2015, Australian authorities reportedly charged 24 people with terrorism-related crimes as a result of nine counterterrorism operations. This total constituted more than a third of all terrorism-related arrests since 2001.¹⁰¹

The Al Risalah Salafist Centre in Sydney, a center closely associated with radicalism and recruitment of IS fighters, was among those sites raided by police in September 2014 in Operation Appleby. The Appleby counterterrorism operation in Sydney and Brisbane was the largest in Australian history involving 800 officers and is thought to have disrupted planned demonstration executions.¹⁰² Afghan-born Baryalei was reported to have possibly been killed in October 2014, shortly after the Appleby raids.

The taking of 17 hostages by self-styled Sheikh Man Haron Monis at the Lindt Cafe at Martin Place in central Sydney in December 2014 did much to reinforce Australian's views of the severity of the terrorist threat from Islamist radicalism. During the 16-hour siege, Monis, who had converted from Shia to Sunni Islam, asked for an IS flag. Police stormed the cafe after Monis killed one of the hostages. As the police stormed the cafe, Monis and another hostage were killed. Monis used Facebook to pledge his allegiance to the "Caliph of the Muslims" six days prior to taking hostages. Reportedly, he had also been under investigation by the Australian Secret Intelligence Organization (ASIO).¹⁰³

State Responses

Australia has undertaken a number of measures to improve its ability to counter Islamist militancy within Australia. Australia has enacted new security laws including enhanced data retention capabilities and has increased funding for intelligence agencies and police by $630 million to help prevent terrorist attacks.¹⁰⁴ In 2014, Prime Minister Abbott amended counterterrorism legislation to grant intelligence agencies "greater powers to monitor citizens suspected of participating in or otherwise supporting jihadist violence and made it easier to prosecute people promoting extremist propaganda."¹⁰⁵ Former Prime Minister Abbott named Ambassador Greg Moriarty National Counterterrorism Coordinator and head of the then newly-formed ¹⁰⁰ Andrew Zammit, Australian Foreign Fighters: Risks and Responses, The Lowy Institute, April 2015.

¹⁰¹ Stephanie Anderson, "Tougher Terrorism Laws to Protect Against 'Incitement of Genocide,'" Malcolm Turnbull, ABC News, <http://www.abc.net.au>.

¹⁰² Peter Chalk, "Black Flag Rising: ISIL in Southeast Asia and Australia," Australian Strategic Policy Institute, December 2015.

¹⁰³ Jessica Kidd, "What We Know About Martin Place's Lindt Cafe Attack," ABC News, December 14, 2015.

¹⁰⁴ Brendan Nicholson, "We Will Fight Islam for 100 Years," The Australian, August 9, 2014.

¹⁰⁵ Peter Chalk, "Black Flag Rising: ISIL in Southeast Asia and Australia," Australian Strategic Policy Institute, December 2015.

Counterterrorism Coordination Office.¹⁰⁶ More recently, a new National Terrorism Threat Advisory System was put in place in November 2015.¹⁰⁷ Following a 2015 attack on police by a 15-year-old, legislation was enacted that lowered the age of control orders for monitoring suspects from 16 to 14.

Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull appears to some to be taking a more conciliatory approach towards the Muslim community in Australia than former prime Minister Abbott. Turnbull met with the Islamic Council of Victoria and visited the Islamic Museum of Australia and has spoken of the need for conciliation with the Australian Muslim community. This contrasts with the approach of Abbott whom the Council had accused of “fearmongering.”¹⁰⁸

Counterterrorism Cooperation with the United States and the Region

When President Obama met with Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull in January 2016 he praised Australia for its counterterror efforts in Afghanistan, Syria, and Iraq “but also [for] countering violent extremism globally.”¹⁰⁹ Australia has contributed to the International Coalition Against Terrorism (ICAT), and related efforts. It has sent rotations of Special Forces troops plus regular troops to Iraq and Afghanistan. About 780 Australian Defence Force personnel are deployed as part of Operation OKRA in Iraq and Syria.¹¹⁰ Australia also has approximately 250 defense personnel deployed in Afghanistan under Operation Highroad. The Highroad forces support the NATO-led Resolute Support mission which replaced the International Security Assistance Force (ISAF).¹¹¹ Australia lost 41 personnel with a further 261 injured during the ISAF mission.¹¹² This support stems from Australia’s shared perspective with the United States and the West of the Islamist threat and from Australia’s commitment to its alliance relationship with the United States.¹¹³ Australia and the United States also work together in intelligence sharing through the Five Eyes intelligence network which also includes Canada, New Zealand, and the United Kingdom.¹¹⁴

Australian and Indonesian counterterror cooperation improved significantly following cooperation on the investigation into the 2002 Bali blasts.¹¹⁵ Australia and Indonesia signed a Memorandum of Understanding on Combating International Terrorism in December 2015 which “will underpin counter-terror cooperation with Indonesia to 2018.”¹¹⁶ Australian Federal Police continue to be deployed across Indonesia as part of a joint effort to “counter terrorism and ¹⁰⁶ Mark Keeny and Tom Allard, “Tony Abbott Names Greg Moriarty as New Counterterror Tsar,” The Sydney Morning Herald, May 25, 2015.

¹⁰⁷ Michelle Grattan, “Turnbull Warns of Increased Threat of Terrorism,” The Conversation, November 23, 2015.

¹⁰⁸ Greg Brown, “Team Australia Benched as PM Sets New Tone,” The Australian, March 8, 2016.

¹⁰⁹ Jeff Mason, “Obama, Australia’s Turnbull Pledge More Cooperation on Counterterrorism,” Reuters, January 19, 2016, <http://www.reuters.com>.

¹¹⁰ Australian Department of Defence, “OKRA HOME,” <http://www.defence.gov.au>.

¹¹¹ “Operation Highroad,” Australian Department of Defence, <http://www.defence.gov.au>.

¹¹² “New Chapter in Afghan Mission,” Australian Department of Defence, January 23, 2015, <http://news.defence.gov.au>.

¹¹³ Peter Finn, “Administration Makes Progress on Resettling Detainees,” The Washington Post, August 20, 2009.

¹¹⁴ “The Price of Being Part of Five Eyes Is Joining ISIS Fight,” One News, January 20, 2015, <https://www.tvnz.co.nz>.

¹¹⁵ David Connery, et. al., “Partners Against Crime: A Short History of the AFP-POLRI Relationship,” Australian Strategic Policy Institute, March 2014, and Minister for Foreign Affairs Downer, “Counter-Terrorism Package,” March 7, 2003.

¹¹⁶ Australia Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade, “Indonesia Country Brief,” <http://dfat.gov.au>.

transnational crime and to build stronger ties with the Indonesian National Police.”¹¹⁷ Australia has partnered with Indonesia and other regional states to build regional states’ counterterrorism capabilities through the Jakarta Centre for Law Enforcement Cooperation (JCLEC). The Centre is intended as a resource for Indonesia and Southeast Asia “in the fight against transnational crime with a focus on counterterrorism.” The Centre has worked with the Southeast Asia Regional Centre for Counterterrorism (SEARCCT) in Kuala Lumpur, the International Law Enforcement Academy in Bangkok, and the ad hoc working group on law enforcement and legal issues established by the Bali Ministerial Meeting on Counter Terrorism.¹¹⁸

Australia and New Zealand are working together both as members of the counter IS coalition in Iraq, as part of their joint Australia-New Zealand Building Partner Capacity mission to train Iraqi army units, and in reinforcing efforts to prevent domestic terrorism through the Australia-New Zealand Counterterrorism Committee. Australia and New Zealand agree that community engagement is “vital to tackle radicalisation and violent extremism” and that it is “vital also to continue to work in cooperation with partner governments in the region to support initiatives to counter violent extremism.”¹¹⁹

Singapore

Singapore, the region’s wealthiest nation, was the target of at least one failed terrorist plot in the 2000s, and could be a potential target for further attacks originated at home or in other countries. A terrorist attack on the city-state could jeopardize its standing as the region’s financial and logistical hub. The small city-state conducts active intelligence sharing with its neighboring states and runs de-radicalization programs in its own Muslim communities, which make up around 14% of its population. Singapore sponsored a regional seminar on de-radicalization in 2015.

Primary Groups

In 2001, the Jemaah Islamiyah network reportedly planned a series of attacks on the city, including the U.S. Embassy, American military vessels, and other Western companies. Singapore responded aggressively, arresting several suspected Islamic militants and holding them under their Internal Security Act (ISA) without trial.

State Responses

Singapore has continued to use its ISA to target suspected terrorists, including the arrest of 27 radicalized Islamist Bangladeshis in January 2016, which Singapore claimed was the first such discovery of a jihadist cell of foreigners.¹²⁰ Singaporean officials maintain that important port facilities and other major targets remain vulnerable. Singapore is a transit point for a wide range of individuals, including suspected terrorists from neighboring countries, and its active port is a trans-shipment point.

¹¹⁷ Minister for Justice, The Honorable Michael Keenan MP, “A Decade of Strengthening Law Enforcement Ties with Indonesia,” August 22, 2014, <https://www.ministerforjustice.gov.au>.

¹¹⁸ Jakarta Centre for Law Enforcement and Cooperation, “About JCLEC,” May 12, 2005, <http://www.jclec.com>.

¹¹⁹ John Key, “Joint Statement—Australia & New Zealand,” February 19, 2016, <https://www.beehive.govt.nz>.

¹²⁰ “27 Radicalised Bangladeshis Arrested in Singapore Under Internal Security Act: MHA,” Straits Times, January 20, 2016.

Counterterrorism Cooperation with the United States and the Region

Prior to 2014, some U.S. officials had expressed concerns about the strength of cooperation. The State Department's 2014 country report on terrorism, however, said that "Singapore and the United States [have] expanded counterterrorism cooperation, including increased information sharing on known and suspected terrorists. U.S. agencies welcomed the closer engagement and continued to see the potential for more strategic and productive agency-to-agency relationships."¹²¹ Among U.S. priorities are improvements in Singapore's port security, where the Department of Homeland Security hopes to see Singapore make greater use of advance manifests to screen containers through its busy port, and improvements to the bilateral extradition treaty.

Outlook

Violent militancy has been a threat in Southeast Asia for many years, increasing in intensity in the years following the September 11, 2001, attacks in the United States, and then seemingly easing in the late 2000s-early 2010s, as Southeast Asian governments' efforts to degrade domestic militant groups appeared to bear fruit. The rise of the Islamic State and the potential it raises for militant recruitment in Southeast Asia and beyond raises new challenges that may guide U.S. counterterrorism policy.

Most analysts assess that terrorist threats in Southeast Asia remain lower than in some other regions. The State Department's 2014 Country Reports on Terrorism said in its Overall Strategic Assessment that Asian countries "took steps in 2014 to strengthen their counterterrorism capabilities through new laws and the development of other means to identify, interdict, and prosecute foreign terrorist fighters and those who support them."¹²²

However, risks remain that Southeast Asia could still be subject to terrorism—either locally organized "lone wolf" attacks or more organized and larger-scale trans-national efforts. Many of the region's most prominent militant groups and individuals have publicly expressed support for the Islamic State, and analysts report substantial IS recruitment activity aimed at the region's large Muslim populations. Analysts have expressed concern about the region's ability to monitor and track new threats arising from the potential return of battle-trained individuals from the Middle East.

It remains difficult to assess whether concrete operational and planning linkages have been established between the Islamic State and Southeast Asian militants, or whether the region's generally successful counterterrorism efforts continue to marginalize militant groups. The course of the region's counterterrorism activities—and the effectiveness of U.S. counterterrorism efforts in Southeast Asia—are likely to remain priority issues for the United States and governments in the region. In part for these reasons, Congress may wish to consider the legislative and oversight tools at its disposal to help develop and shape the ordering and pursuit of priorities to counter terrorism and violent extremism in Southeast Asia.

¹²¹ State Department, "Country Reports on Terrorism 2014," accessed at <http://www.state.gov/documents/organization/239631.pdf>.

¹²² State Department, "Country Reports on Terrorism 2014," accessed at <http://www.state.gov/documents/organization/239631.pdf>.

Author Contact Information

(name redacted)
Specialist in Asian Affairs
[redacted]@crs.loc.gov7-....

(name redacted)
Specialist in Asian Affairs
[redacted]@crs.loc.gov7-....

(name redacted)
Specialist in Asian Affairs
[redacted]@crs.loc.gov , 7-....

(name redacted)
Specialist in Asian Affairs
[redacted]@crs.loc.gov.

(name redacted)
Analyst in Asian Affairs
[redacted]@crs.loc.gov7-....

(name redacted)
Specialist in Terrorism and National Security
[redacted]@crs.loc.gov7-....

EveryCRSReport.com

The Congressional Research Service (CRS) is a federal legislative branch agency, housed inside the Library of Congress, charged with providing the United States Congress non-partisan advice on issues that may come before Congress.

EveryCRSReport.com republishes CRS reports that are available to all Congressional staff. The reports are not classified, and Members of Congress routinely make individual reports available to the public.

Prior to our republication, we redacted names, phone numbers and email addresses of analysts who produced the reports. We also added this page to the report. We have not intentionally made any other changes to any report published on EveryCRSReport.com.

CRS reports, as a work of the United States government, are not subject to copyright protection in the United States. Any CRS report may be reproduced and distributed in its entirety without permission from CRS. However, as a CRS report may include copyrighted images or material from a third party, you may need to obtain permission of the copyright holder if you wish to copy or otherwise use copyrighted material.

Information in a CRS report should not be relied upon for purposes other than public understanding of information that has been provided by CRS to members of Congress in connection with CRS' institutional role.

EveryCRSReport.com is not a government website and is not affiliated with CRS. We do not claim copyright on any CRS report we have republished.